When Chaos, Fear and Luck Reigned in Moscow

Washington Post Service
This article was reported and written by Fred Hiatt, Margaret Shapiro and Lee Hockander.
MOSCOW — When it ended Monday afternoon, the ragtag rebels seemed so frightened and forlorn that it was hard to believe Russia had been threatened at all.
But for 12 hours beginning Sunday afternoon, the world's largest nation teetered on the edge of a coup d'état. A few thousand Communists, neo-Nazis, nationalists and adventure-seekers, many of whom dreamed of restoring the Soviet Union, came within hours and yards of seizing the levers of power.
In the Defense Ministry in central Moscow, the desperate top brass were for a time reduced to guarding their own building and its nuclear codes, with each deputy minister and three-star general securing a separate building entrance. President Boris N. Yeltsin was nearly a prisoner inside the massively fortified Kremlin, unable for a time to appear on national television. At 2 A.M. Monday, he drove to the Defense Ministry to nail down army support.

The central television station was saved only by the arrival five minutes before the rebels of 100 special-forces troops who sped around Moscow's Garden Ring Road in armored personnel carriers. That, and two primitive reserve studios in a hidden location, kept Mr. Yeltsin's forces from being entirely cut off from the nation.
Still, for several hours Sunday evening, there seemed to be no one defending the city for Mr. Yeltsin. Vice President Alexander V. Rutskoi and his allies were preparing to rule, confidently promising mercy for their vanquished foes and glory for their supporters.
"When I made my way across the city, and I saw no police on the streets, and I saw these groups of people, sometimes armed people — it was a rather fearful situation," said Sergei Stankevich, a top Yeltsin adviser who tried unsuccessfully to drive from the Kremlin to the television center. "There was a moment in the night when it seemed the balance was very shaky."
The fateful events began shortly after 2 P.M. Sunday, when determined, exulting demonstrators first began clubbing hapless policemen and breaking through police lines.
It ended Monday afternoon, with Mr. Rutskoi sitting inside the besieged parliament building, frantically dialing for help as tank rounds slammed into the walls around him.

The last holdouts of Mr. Yeltsin's banned parliament sat in the dark and windowless Hall of Nationalities, burning a few candles and singing a Soviet victory song from World War II.
Now Mr. Yeltsin is accusing his enemies of having planned and nearly carried out a plot they had been hatching for months. Some of his conservative rivals accuse Mr. Yeltsin of having provoked the entire affair. There may be elements of truth in both accusations.
But these articles — based on observations during the uprising, on dozens of interviews conducted since and on Russian journalists' accounts — show that the overwhelming mood during the uprising was one of confusion, fear and happenstance.

"I found signs of anxiety everywhere," said Anatoli Shabad, a liberal legislator who entered the all-but-deserted presidential offices inside the Kremlin sometime after 5 P.M. Sunday as mobs were smashing the mayor's office near the parliament and preparing to take over the television studio. "No one was prepared. No one was in the Kremlin, although there had been every sign of a coming rebellion from the previous day."
The previous day, Saturday, hundreds of families had gathered on Moscow's Arbat to celebrate the 50th anniversary of that historic street, now a pedestrian mall of sorts. Children ate ice cream, clutched balloons, watched puppet shows on one of the few sunny days Moscow had enjoyed in months.

A few blocks away, Mr. Rutskoi also took advantage of the weather for a stroll. Leaving the parliament building where he had been holed up since Sept. 21, the former air force pilot with the thick mustache began haranguing the police officers who were encircling the parliament on orders of Mr. Yeltsin.
"What laws have you come to defend?" Mr. Rutskoi demanded to know. "Yeltsin

Clinton Will Bolster Force in Somalia but Withdraw March 31

He Says U.S. Aim Is to Spur Food Relief And Protect the Country from Anarchy

By Paul F. Horvitz
International Herald Tribune

WASHINGTON — President Bill Clinton announced Thursday that he was sending heavy armor, an aircraft carrier and an extra 5,300 troops to Somalia, outside the umbrella of the United Nations, to keep food relief flowing and armed clansmen from returning the country to "anarchy."
But Mr. Clinton set an ambitious, six-month deadline for the security operation, saying that all but a few hundred U.S. support personnel would be withdrawn from Somalia no later than March 31.

The president laid out his policy change after a long and contentious White House meeting with key members of Congress. The meeting followed a fierce weekend gun battle in Mogadishu, the Somali capital, that left 13 Americans dead, more than 70 wounded and many members of Congress vociferously calling for a quick U.S. pullout.

The policy shift announced Thursday was supported, however, by key leaders in both parties and in both houses of Congress.
But it was a clear rebuke to the civilian and military leadership of the United Nations, which currently commands about 28,000 troops in Somalia, including 5,400 American soldiers already there.

"Our mission from this day forward," Mr. Clinton said in a 10-minute televised address from his White House office, "is to increase our strength, do our job, bring our soldiers out, and bring them home."

But the president stressed throughout his message that he wanted the U.S. pullout to be conducted "on our terms" and with Washington's credibility as the world's preeminent power intact.

"Let us finish the work we set out to do," Mr. Clinton said. "Let us demonstrate to the world, as generations of Americans have done before us, that when Americans take on a challenge, they do the job right."

To do otherwise, the president said, would invite "aggressors, thugs and terrorists" to conclude that the best way to force the United States to change policies "is to kill our people."

Specifically, Mr. Clinton said he was hoping to rejuvenate efforts at a political settlement in Somalia by sending back to Mogadishu the special U.S. envoy, Robert Oakley. In addition, Washington will press neighboring nations and the Organization of African Union to help restore political stability to Somalia.

Specifically, Mr. Clinton ordered 1,700 new combat troops to Somalia and ordered 3,600 Marines to deploy offshore as a "quick reaction force."

The new troops, plus 104 more armored vehicles and air power off the aircraft carrier Abraham Lincoln, will be deployed first to protect U.S. troops and bases. They will also secure roads, the port of Mogadishu and lines of communications needed by UN forces and relief agencies "to keep the flow of food and

Aidid Rebuffs Red Cross in Its Attempt to See U.S. Pilot

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

MOGADISHU, Somalia — An aide to Mohammed Farrah Aidid said Thursday that the Red Cross would not be permitted to visit a captured American pilot unless military operations against the Somali warlord were halted.

Six other U.S. soldiers were still missing after a 16-hour assault on Sunday.

Helicopters circled Mogadishu at dusk Thursday with loudspeakers calling the names of the missing Americans and urging them not to surrender because U.S. forces were searching for them, Somali witnesses said.

There was sporadic fighting Thursday in Mogadishu and U.S. casualties continued to rise. General Aidid's militiamen lobbed two mortar rounds into the United Nations-controlled airport compound, killing a U.S. Army Ranger and wounding 12.

Three of the servicemen, in serious condition, were being flown to a U.S. base in Germany for treatment.

The United Nations said it would evacuate nonessential civilian staff from Mogadishu to Nairobi. A UN spokesman, Farouk Mawlawi, said the decision would affect "dozens" of UN workers.

The Red Cross said it was negotiating to visit a U.S. helicopter pilot, Chief Warrant Officer Michael Durant, the only American known to have fallen into the hands of General Aidid's gunmen in Sunday's battle.

In Nairobi, Abdulatif Mohammed Abub, the chief delegate of the Aidid faction in the Kenyan capital, said the Red Cross would be allowed to visit the pilot only if American troops halted military action.

"The hostility has to stop," he said. "All military activity has to stop."
Mr. Abdulatif said the pilot was "much better" than he had looked in a videotape released to news agencies, when he had appeared shaken and bruised and reportedly suffering a broken leg.

Mr. Abdulatif repeated an offer to trade the American for Somalis taken prisoner.

Nobel Prize for Literature Awarded to Toni Morrison

By William Grimes
New York Times Service

NEW YORK — Toni Morrison, the author of "Song of Solomon," "Beloved," "Jazz" and other morally urgent, grippingly narrated novels of black American life, was awarded the 1993 Nobel Prize for literature Thursday.

The announcement was made in Stockholm by the Nobel Committee of the Swedish Academy, which stated that Ms. Morrison "gives life to an essential aspect of American reality" in novels "characterized by visionary force and poetic import."

Calling Ms. Morrison "a literary artist of the first rank," the academy went on to say: "She delves into the language itself, a language she wants to liberate from the fetters of race. And she addresses us with the luster of poetry."

Ms. Morrison, 62, is the 90th recipient of the prize, which carries a cash award worth $825,000. She is the eighth woman laureate. The last was Nadine Gordimer of South Africa, in 1991.

In a telephone interview from Princeton, New Jersey, Ms. Morrison said: "This is a palpable tremor of delight for me. It was wholly unexpected and so satisfying. Regardless of what we all say and truly believe about the irrelevance of prizes and their relationship to the real world, nevertheless this is a signal honor for me."

Ms. Morrison, who since 1987 has taught creative writing at Princeton University, published her first novel, "The Bluest Eye," in 1970. Set in her hometown, Lorain, Ohio, it describes a black girl's painful coming of age in a white society.

In her five subsequent novels, she established herself as one America's leading writers of fiction, a gifted, popular storyteller whose troubled characters and their struggles expose fault lines of a society built on racial prejudice. In her most recent novel, "Jazz" (1992), she left behind the small-town world of her previous novels to tell, using a complex, polyphonic technique, a tale of passion and violence set in Harlem in the 1920s.

Her novel "Beloved," published in 1987, was an enormous commercial success and earned her the Pulitzer Prize for fiction in 1988.

"This is a great day for African-Americans, and for Americans in general," said Henry Louis Gates Jr., the chairman of the Afro-American Studies Department at Harvard University, and the co-editor of a collection of essays on Ms. Morrison's work.

"Just two centuries ago the African-American literary tradition was born in slave narratives," he said. "Now our greatest writer has won the Nobel Prize." Last year, the prize went to Derek Walcott, a poet from St. Lucia.

In Lorain, a steel town about 25 miles west of Cleveland, Ms. Morrison was born Chloe Anthony Wofford.

She earned a bachelor's degree in English from Howard University in Washington in 1953 and a master's degree in English from Cornell University in 1955, where she wrote her thesis on the theme of suicide in the works of William Faulkner and Virginia Woolf.

After leaving Cornell, she embarked on an academic career, teaching English at Texas Southern University in Houston and at Howard University. While at Howard, she married Harold Morrison, an architect, with whom she had two children, Harold and Slade. The couple divorced in 1964.

In the early 1960s, while at Howard, she began writing fiction as part of an informal group of poets and writers who met to discuss their work. She came to one meeting with a short story, about a black girl who longed to have blue eyes, that would evolve into her first novel.

She followed up "The Bluest Eye" with "Sula" (1973), which was nominated for a National Book Award, "Song of Solomon" (1977),

UN Will Ease Pretoria Curbs

UNITED NATIONS, New York (AP) — The UN General Assembly will lift economic sanctions against South Africa on Friday but will delay ending its oil embargo until blacks help to start governing in a transitional council, a UN spokeswoman said Thursday.
She said the assembly will vote to lift restrictions on trade, investment, finance, travel and transportation. The vote would come two weeks after the ANC president, Nelson Mandela, urged the assembly to lift economic sanctions and encourage international investment in South Africa.

Bhutto Set to Return After Slim Victory

By Molly Moore
Washington Post Service

ISLAMABAD — Three years after Benazir Bhutto was expelled from office, she was poised Thursday to return as Pakistan's prime minister after her party narrowly won a plurality of seats in parliamentary elections.

Miss Bhutto's party won 86 seats in the National Assembly, to 72 seats for former Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif.

But both insisted that they could win the allegiance of enough of the 42 seats claimed by independent candidates and minority groups to form a government.

Islamic fundamentalist candidates fared worse than they had in recent elections in what was seen as a rebuke by voters to their plans to further Islamize Pakistan.

International observers said that the vote Wednesday was perhaps the freest and fairest election in Pakistan since 1970.

Most political observers say that Miss Bhutto, 40, will prevail over Mr. Sharif in the scramble to form a government. She expressed confidence that she could do so but indicated disappointment at her weak showing in the election.

"We were expecting a much larger margin," Miss Bhutto said Thursday.

The candidate who wins enough support to form a government will come to power under the shadow of the interim prime minister, Moen Qureshi, a former World Bank official who many people here feel has done more to reform the country during his three months in office than any governmental leader in recent years.

Mr. Qureshi had moved decisively to crack down on drug barons, expose corruption, put a halt to expensive and foolhardy government spending and introduce some fiscal responsibility to government.

Political observers in Pakistan noted that in addition to the battle between Miss Bhutto and

In Its Olympian Quest for a Slogan, Atlanta Is at a Loss for Words

By Peter Applebome
New York Times Service

ATLANTA — The former "Gate City of the South," "Capital of the New South," "City Too Busy to Hate," "Black Mecca" and "World's Next Great City" has a problem.

After a year of earnest groping, Atlanta's best consultants and image makers have yet to come up with just the right slogan to market their city before the world comes calling at the 1996 Olympic Games.

As the effort lurches along, the impression is growing that Atlanta's quest for the perfect catch phrase is saying a lot more about a place that is a mixture of myth, charm, hype and hustle than the anointed slogan ever will.

The search began a year ago when Atlanta unveiled five marketing slogans under the aegis of Joel Babbit, a former adman who gained national attention last year with marketing plans to sell corporate sponsorships for everything from city parks to garbage trucks. The slogans ranged from the pithy but vague "Atlanta: Unforgettable" to the red-white-and-blue "Atlanta: Hometown of the American Dream" to the appropriately international "Atlanta: What the World Is Coming To."

None was judged a home run.
Later, another marketing consultant, the Nu-cifora Consulting Group, was called in to tap the mood of the populace.

This summer the consultants declared, "Not since Margaret Mitchell's flames swept Tara has the city of Atlanta invited such focus on its image from those who live here and those who do business here from across the country and around the world."

Emphasizing that its mission was not about finding a slogan but rather "defining the city in terms of its attributes and how the public perceives it," the consulting group sketched out five "marketing platforms." They included "Atlanta: Anything Is Possible" and "Atlanta: Claiming Its Own International Destiny."

After town hall meetings, polls of 1,000 influential people around the world and about 5,000 responses ranging from rap songs to detailed marketing plans, the consultants plan to present a broad marketing strategy and possible slogans to the Atlanta Convention and Visitors Bureau at the end of this month.

In a city that has never been loath to reinvent itself, the process has a familiar ring.

"The image that best sums up Atlanta is the cash register," said the novelist Anne Rivers Siddons. "So far, the soul of the city has been money and business. You think about Chicago and you think of broad shoulders. I don't think we're old enough for this kind of identity."

Indeed, age and circumstance do provide image problems for Atlanta. Not founded until 1842, Atlanta made its biggest historical mark when General Sherman set a torch to it 22 years

Russians Mourn Dead as Yeltsin Strengthens Hand

By Celestine Bohlen
New York Times Service

MOSCOW — Flags flew at half-staff across Moscow on Thursday, even from atop the charred parliament building, as Russia observed a national day of mourning and families held funerals for those who died in the violence that engulfed the capital on Sunday and Monday.

"Russia, its people and its leaders, must learn a solemn lesson from the bloodshed and do everything in their power so that the tragedy cannot happen again," President Boris N. Yeltsin said in a statement.

With two months to go before elections for a new parliament, Mr. Yeltsin continued to press ahead with a series of decrees designed to strengthen his political authority both in Moscow and in the country's regions.

After forcing the resignation Wednesday of Valeri D. Zorkin as chairman of Russia's Constitutional Court, Mr. Yeltsin issued a decree suspending the court altogether until the adoption of a new constitution.

"Twice in 1993, the court, through its hasty actions, pushed Russia to the brink of civil war," Mr. Yeltsin said in his decree. "But when the risk of civil war grew real, the court did nothing."

He instructed the new chief justice, Nikolai Vitruk, to draft proposals for a new constitutional court. One suggestion is to create a constitutional collegium within the Russian Supreme Court.

In another attempt to keep a close rein on the regions, Mr. Yeltsin ordered that all governors and heads of regional administrations be henceforth appointed, and dismissed, by the president. Over the last year, seven local governments had been popularly elected, and some of these sided with the Russian parliament in its struggle against Mr. Yeltsin.

Mr. Yeltsin on Wednesday called on regional councils — or Soviets — to disband themselves voluntarily, and hold new elections in December. In some places, regional deputies have already put the question of self-dissolution on the agenda, but in others the president's move threw local political leaders into a familiar stand-off.

"I don't have reasons to talk about self-dissolution," said Oleg Anisimchik, chairman of the regional Soviet in the region of Samara. Kiryan Ilyumzhinov, elected president of the region of Kalmykia last spring, warned that Mr. Yeltsin was moving to set up a "dictatorship," which, he said, "will inevitably split the country."

From Khabarovsk in Russia's Far East, the newspaper Izvestia reported Thursday evening that the local leadership, which had declared Mr. Yeltsin's Sept. 21 decree disbanding the national parliament to be unconstitutional, was now in the process of "reconstructing" its position.

A deputy chairman of the regional Soviet told a reporter that the deputies had "been brainwashed by the Supreme Soviet, thrown into the euphoria of a senseless struggle."

Censorship of newspapers, imposed as part of a continuing state of emergency in Moscow, was lifted Thursday. But the suspension of opposition papers remained in effect, even though experts noted that this was in direct violation of Russia's fragile law on freedom of the press.

As the press and security officials continue to thrash over the sequence of events that led to the violent confrontation, Mr. Yeltsin's office announced that the Russian president was scheduled to meet Friday with the leaders of Armenia, Georgia and Azerbaijan, and is continuing preparation for an official visit to Japan starting on Monday.

Nikolai Ryabov, who heads the Central Election Commission, said at a news conference that all but three of Russia's regions and territories have already agreed to hold elections for a new national parliament.

The new parliament will consist of 450 members, half of whom will be elected from single districts, and half from party lists. To run candidates in the elections, parties must collect 100,000 signatures from at least seven regions, Mr. Ryabov said.

Interior Minister Viktor F. Yerin said that 49 bodies had been found inside the White House, as the Russian Parliament building is known, far fewer than the number reported by leaders during gun and tank battles last Monday. According to figures from the Russian Health Ministry, the total number of dead in the two-day rebellion now stands at 142.

Mr. Yerin also said that Viktor Anpilov, a leader of Working Moscow, one of the most belligerent of the anti-Yeltsin opposition groups, had been arrested at a country house outside the city of Tula.

At his news conference, Mr. Yerin admitted that security forces had made tactical mistakes last Sunday, when demonstrators forced their way through police barricades. But he insisted that "not a single unit of the Interior Ministry and interior troops shifted to the White House side."

Mr. Major and Lady Thatcher leaving the platform Thursday at the Conservative conference.

Tories Close Ranks Around Major

By David B. Ottaway

BLACKPOOL, England — The Conservative Party sought Thursday to close the book on a troubled year of infighting and U-turns by rallying behind Prime Minister John Major.

He emerged looking stronger after forceful backing from his past and present finance ministers, although he could easily have been overshadowed by the adoring welcome that the party's annual conference gave to his predecessor, Margaret Thatcher.

In a warning to right-wingers who still hanker after Lady Thatcher, the chancellor of the Exchequer, Kenneth Clarke, assailed "enemies griping like mad" about Mr. Major's leadership. "Any enemy of John Major is an enemy of mine," he said. "Any enemy of John Major is no friend of the Conservative Party."

Just as gratifying for Mr. Major was an unambiguous endorsement from the previous chancellor, Norman Lamont. Since he was forced out in May, Mr. Lamont had been a bitter critic of Mr. Major's questioning his leadership and giving the impression that he might stand against him. But on Thursday Mr. Lamont said, "I have no doubt that with John Major we can win — and win we must."

Western diplomats in Zagreb expressed deep dismay at the UN Security Council's decision to authorize a new mission to investigate the situation in Croatia.

The UN report was released just as the United States had begun achieving its first successes in persuading the Croatian government to end the massive abuses of human rights being perpetrated by Bosnian Croats against Muslim civilians and prisoners.

Last month the Bosnian Croats began releasing thousands of half-starved Muslims from detention centers around Mostar in southwestern Bosnia and improving conditions in their remaining POW camps.

The UN report also seems certain to continue frustrating the efforts of the 25,000-member UN Protection Force to revive a peace plan aimed at restoring the Croatian government's authority over Serb-held areas of the country.

The Croatian Serbs, who broke away to form their own "Republic of Krajina" early last year, have stated that they will never again accept Croatian rule and that they intend shortly to merge with Serbia.

On Monday, the UN Security Council renewed the mandate of the Protection Force for six more months and ordered it to implement the peace plan without any additional military means to do so.

The Croatian Army seized the three villages near Gopce in southwestern Croatia on Sept. 9. A week later they withdrew, after much international pressure and heavy Serbian bombardment of several Croatian cities and industrial centers.

The report on the UN investigation, which includes photographs as well as video and audio materials and statements from survivors, found the Croatian Army's destruction to have been "systematic, thorough and well planned."

Rumors Draw Curious to Lenin's Tomb

By David B. Ottaway

MOSCOW — Russians hurried to seize what could be their last chance to visit the Lenin Mausoleum on Thursday as word spread around the capital that its doors might soon be locked forever.

"We've just come out of curiosity because we heard it might soon be closed," said a young man who had come with two companions.

The rumor that the tomb might be closed followed an order Wednesday by President Boris N. Yeltsin replacing the goose-stepping military guard outside the marble building in Red Square with ordinary police officers.

Not everyone approved of the break with Communist ritual.

Anatoli Alexandrov, a 58-year-old mining engineer, said he was visiting for the first time.

"I always used to take the view that a dead body was just a dead body, but I came today because it appears our government is going to liquidate it. After all, it's a historic landmark."

Two elderly women staffing the mausoleum's cloakroom said the number of visitors had fallen off dramatically since 1991, the year Leninism ceased to be the official state ideology.

"We used to have all these excursion groups and out-of-town visitors, but they have all stopped coming," one said.

The tomb to the organizer of the Russian Revolution used to be the holiest of Soviet shrines, attracting millions of visitors a year. Guards would tell visitors to take their hands out of their pockets and keep silent as they filed down the steps to the chamber where Lenin's body lay in its glass case.

On Thursday, Lenin was still there, his blue-and-white polka-dot tie neatly tied and his way face glowing as usual under the dim spotlights. But the solemn music and atmosphere of veneration had vanished.

Since the collapse of communism Russians have been unable to decide on what to do about the mausoleum and the adjacent graves of Communist heroes, including the American writer John Reed.

Some are now regarded as criminals, while others, such as World War II military leaders, are still venerated.

Another shrine to the dead leader, the Lenin museum, was closed on Thursday for technical reasons. The dark red building, dating from 1892, will revert to being the home of the Moscow City Council, Mayor Yuri Luzhkov said Tuesday.

The liberals telephoned a deputy interior minister, Yevgeniy Semyonov, and learned that the news was worse than they feared.

"He said at least part of the force had turned to Russia," Mr. Semyonov recalled. "He said in the city there was no force that might oppose Russia."

By 3:25, they were streaming onto the grounds of the parliament, the White House. Mr. Yeltsin's cordon was broken. Officers in riot gear from the Interior Ministry's elite Dzerzhinsky Division were crashing through the plate-glass windows of a nearby office building to flee in panic, leaving weapons, shields and vehicles behind.

That afternoon, Russia's leading democratic politicians were meeting in the Press House in central Moscow to prepare strategy for the Dec. 12 elections called by Mr. Yeltsin. At 4:30, Anatoli Shvabov recalled, the liberals got the word: The cordons had been broken, the mayor's office had been taken, rebels were surging toward the Tass news agency and the television center.

UN Accuses Croat Army Of Serbian Massacre

By David B. Ottaway

Washington Post Service

ZAGREB, Croatia — The United Nations Protection Force in the former Yugoslavia accused the Croatian Army on Thursday of practicing "a comprehensive scorched earth policy" and systematically killing scores of civilians when it withdrew last month from three captured Croatian Serbian villages in southwestern Croatia.

Croatian militia troops involved in the three-way civil war with Serbs and Muslims in Bosnia have often been accused of committing such atrocities. But this is the first time since the war between Croatia and Serbia ended in early 1992 that the UN peacekeeping force here has documented in such extensive detail the involvement of the regular Croatian Army in "ethnic cleansing" as well as other serious human rights violations.

A statement released here Thursday describing the results of a three-week investigation of the mid-September episode said that UN troops who went to the area found the remains of 18 bodies.

It said that in addition to the 18 recovered bodies, 52 had been returned by the Croatian Army to the Croatian Serbian militia forces while at least 28 other Croatian Serbian soldiers and civilians were still unaccounted for.

The statement indicated, according to the statement, "the intentional killing of Serbian civilians who were unable to escape the attack, regardless of age, sex or status."

Western diplomats in Zagreb expressed deep dismay at the UN Security Council's decision to authorize a new mission to investigate the situation in Croatia.

The UN report was released just as the United States had begun achieving its first successes in persuading the Croatian government to end the massive abuses of human rights being perpetrated by Bosnian Croats against Muslim civilians and prisoners.

Last month the Bosnian Croats began releasing thousands of half-starved Muslims from detention centers around Mostar in southwestern Bosnia and improving conditions in their remaining POW camps.

The UN report also seems certain to continue frustrating the efforts of the 25,000-member UN Protection Force to revive a peace plan aimed at restoring the Croatian government's authority over Serb-held areas of the country.

The Croatian Serbs, who broke away to form their own "Republic of Krajina" early last year, have stated that they will never again accept Croatian rule and that they intend shortly to merge with Serbia.

On Monday, the UN Security Council renewed the mandate of the Protection Force for six more months and ordered it to implement the peace plan without any additional military means to do so.

The Croatian Army seized the three villages near Gopce in southwestern Croatia on Sept. 9. A week later they withdrew, after much international pressure and heavy Serbian bombardment of several Croatian cities and industrial centers.

WORLD BRIEFS

Attacks Shut Down Much of Haiti

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (NYT) — In a direct challenge to international efforts to restore democracy in Haiti, gunmen collaborating openly with the police shut down this city and much of the countryside Thursday, enforcing their call for a national strike with tear gas and automatic weapons fire.

On the second day of what is intended as a rapid United Nations-mandated buildup of 1,300 foreign police officers and soldiers, the gunmen sprayed open-air markets with bullets, stopped buses and scattered pedestrians on streets at gunpoint. One group of foreigners was stopped by plainclothes agents brandishing machine guns and grenades.

Although it produced no known casualties, the offensive succeeded in draining the country's streets and roads of traffic on a day when the first contingent of 50 Canadian police officers arrived to help secure the peace. About 250 American troops are scheduled to arrive Monday, and diplomats said that Haitians opposed to the return of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide at the end of this month hoped to scare off the restoration effort by making Haiti appear too volatile for a delicate political transition.

Burma Accused of 'Reign of Terror'

LONDON (AP) — Amnesty International delivered a stinging indictment of Burma's military authorities in a new report, saying they had created a "reign of terror" characterized by fear, intimidation and widespread human rights violations.

The report said there were "hundreds of political opponents still behind bars and members of minority groups in particular are subjected to arbitrary detention, torture and summary executions."

Even political prisoners who have been released in the last 18 months, estimated to number about 2,000, are still subject to intense intimidation, military surveillance and restricted freedoms, Amnesty International said. It said hundreds of political prisoners remained in detention in Burma, including at least 66 prisoners of conscience.

Rocard Is Fined for Libeling Le Pen

PARIS (Reuters) — The French Socialist Party leader, Michel Rocard, was fined for libel by a Paris court on Thursday for accusing the rightist National Front leader, Jean-Marie Le Pen, of torturing Arab prisoners during the Algerian War.

The court fined Mr. Rocard 10,000 francs ($1,760) and ordered him to pay a further 8,000 francs damages for making the accusations during a television debate in February 1992.

The court agreed that Mr. Le Pen publicly justified the use of torture by the French Army during the 1954-1962 Algerian War, but said he never admitted to having been involved.

Executives Seized in Italy Debt Affair

ROME (Reuters) — The Italian police on Thursday arrested a top banking executive and the managing director of Federconsorzi, a failed farm holding company whose collapse in 1991 plunged Italy into a huge international debt scandal.

The police said Rosario Conso, central director of Credito Italiano SPA, the large state bank that is to be privatized by 1994, and Paolo Borsari, managing director of Federconsorzi, are suspected of fraudulent bankruptcy and breaking bankruptcy laws. They are under investigation in an inquiry into the events leading to Federconsorzi's collapse.

Clinton Meets With Syrian Official

WASHINGTON (Reuters) — President Bill Clinton and Foreign Minister Farouk Shara of Syria met Thursday to discuss efforts to negotiate a peace between Israel and Syria, White House officials said.

The meeting, the highest-level session in Washington between the two countries in 19 years, was conducted without the limelight usually focused on foreign dignitaries. The two men did not pose for pictures, and Mr. Shara did not talk with reporters after the meeting.

The United States has been trying to encourage progress in the peace talks between Syria and Israel following the breakthrough agreement between the Israelis and the Palestine Liberation Organization, but the Syrians have reacted cautiously.

TRAVEL UPDATE

U.S. Airlines Trim Fares to Europe

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) — American Airlines on Thursday took about 20 percent off its lowest winter fares to much of Europe in cuts that were immediately matched by TWA and United Airlines.

American said it made the discounts, which do not apply to Britain, because of poor demand for travel across the Atlantic. TWA matched the cuts in all markets where it competes with American. United did the same, adding fare cuts to Amsterdam and Athens.

The U.S. State Department has said that Americans are still vulnerable to attacks in Lebanon and that it is not yet time to lift the ban on travel there. The assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern and South Asian affairs, Edward P. Djerjian, said that the government was "not yet able to extend its authority throughout the country," and that Islamic fundamentalist groups saw "the kidnapping or killing of an American as a means to further their terrorist or obstructionist agendas." Singapore Airlines plans to prohibit smoking on all flights to and from Australia and the Indian subcontinent beginning Dec. 1. The change affects flights to and from Sydney, Melbourne, Adelaide, Brisbane, Darwin, Delhi and Male in the Maldives. (Bloomberg)

Agnes de Mille, Legendary American Dancer and Choreographer, Dies

The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Agnes de Mille, the dancer and choreographer whose works helped make "Oklahoma!" a landmark of musical theater, has died, a funeral director said Thursday. She was believed to be 88.

Miss de Mille, who had suffered for years from the effects of a stroke, died at her New York home late Wednesday or early Thursday.

She alternated between Broadway — doing dances for shows such as "Carousel," "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes" and "Paint Your Wagon" — and

Give the Forces a Deadline for Getting Aidid

By William Safire

WASHINGTON — The world's humanitarian objective in Somalia was to feed the starving and to make it possible for the population to begin to feed itself. That objective is being met, and the saving of hundreds of thousands of lives is no small thing.

The more recent United Nations military objective has been to discover the hideout of Mohammed Farrah Aidid, to capture him and disarm his hooligan forces. That forcible pacification — the euphemism is "peacekeeping" — would lessen the danger of warlordism choking the area again. In that objective, the United Nations has failed.

The United States shares responsibility for that military failure. It was mistaken to remove the main body of U.S. troops before the job was done. Washington was foolish to leave a too small detachment of combat troops to undertake a search-and-seizure mission with (a) faulty intelligence, (b) inadequately armed "quick reaction" reserves, (c) no plan of retreat in case helicopters were shot down, and (d) only hazy coordination with other nations' forces.

As a result, last weekend U.S. forces suffered more than 90 casualties, including at least 12 dead. Not since the failure of commanders to protect a perimeter against a truck-bomber led to 241 deaths in Lebanon, and the failure of machinery and nerve aborted a rescue mission at Desert One, has a military operation been so costly to America.

As another result of this lapse in judgment, we had the spectacle of the heads of the Defense and State Departments exposing their indecision before a panicked crowd of legislators in an overheated basement.

Instead of agonizing over the conduct of top brass in a sexual harassment investigation, Defense Secretary Les Aspin should be finding out why U.S. forces cannot conduct a specific mission without incurring casualties that undermine public support for the entire operation.

When Major General Thomas Montgomery urgently requested tanks last month, who in the Pentagon turned him down, and why? Was his military mission then amended downward in light of this refusal of weaponry that he considered vital? Did he proceed to order an attack despite believing that his backup rescue force was too lightly armed? Belatedly, the tanks are being sent.

And the sustained intelligence failure cries out for oversight. U.S. military spokesmen complain that Somalis communicate by means too primitive for sophisticated U.S. equipment, and that UN officials discouraged the use of "humint." Excuses abound.

But think of it: Thirty billion dollars a year goes to an intelligence establishment that cannot hire one spy in the south end of Mogadishu to pinpoint the location of a famous warlord who gives press interviews and broadcasts radio statements of defiance. Somalia has exposed the weakness of U.S. defense intelligence.

The American admiral who leads U.S. coloration to the UN command, Jonathan Howe, should be no stranger to intelligence, having begun his bureaucratic rise working for Al Haig in the days of White House wifetaps. But when "General" Aidid was readily captured, Admiral Howe and his UN boss waffled: in the current reassessment, he should be the first to go.

From the lessons of Somalia, a few constructive caveats for the president:

Do not assume that the people who demand that you stop the killing and pull out now will absolve you later when they are horrified at the sight of starving children.

Do not let those who say "Get serious or get out" define the debate: they want out quick. The debate is about defending the survival rights of the defenseless.

at a real cost to the United States; you must decide what you think America can and should do. Then explain why. Then let Congress react.

Do not put U.S. troops under UN control anytime, anywhere; this includes Bosnia.

Do not flinch in the face of casualties or permit policy to be hostage-driven; the hardest part of being president is being forced to spend lives to save lives. But hold commanders accountable for mistakes that unnecessarily cost lives.

All bravely advised; now how does America extricate itself honorably? Give Defense and CIA a deadline and the resources to get Aidid; if that "exit strategy" fails, let the United Nations make a deal with him, and develop the ability to do the job next time.

The New York Times.

Flummoxed Again

I favored sending U.S. troops to Somalia. But I was naive about what would happen after the starving were fed. Just as we were flummoxed in that ignominious war in which we were to destroy Vietnam in order to save it, we are flummoxed by how to be humanitarian in tanks.

The Cold War over, we embarked on a warm one and were not ready for its particular demands. There are organizations that feed people, and organizations that do battle with them. Together they make an uneasy marriage.

We won't be sending U.S. troops to Bosnia any time soon after this, that's for certain, no matter what the pictures tell us about the horrendous plight of those poor people. And we'll be bringing them home from Somalia.

Standing Up for Moral Aspiration

By George Weigel

WASHINGTON — "Veritatis Splendor" ("The Splendor of Truth"), Pope John Paul II's new encyclical on the moral life, is a bold reaffirmation of the human capacity to know the right thing and do the right thing. But that bracing message, which should hearten any sensitive spirit in this century of Auschwitz and the Gulag, could be obscured by the popular obsession with the politics of sex.

While the encyclical briefly discusses sexual morality and challenges the libertinism that often characterizes the "sexual revolution," it is far, far more than another tired critique of the Playboy philosophy. There is no prudery here, but rather a sophisticated Christian humanism that celebrates the beauty and mystery of human sexuality even as it reminds us of the importance of self-discipline, respect for others and conjugal fidelity.

The pope is pressing some prior moral questions right down to first principles. What is the good life? How should we live? What is the right thing? According to many philosophers and not a few theologians, we have no compelling answers to those questions today, no answers we can know to be true.

The radical claim of "Veritatis Splendor" is that those questions can be answered and we can know that the answers are true: not by rote submission to religious authoritarianism, but because human beings have the capacity to discern the truth of things and the ability to act on that discernment. We can do the right thing because we can know the right thing to do.

That, to put it mildly, is an intrepid affirmation in today's cultural climate, in which a benign skepticism and relativism are frequently thought to be the best that we can do. John Paul insists that we can do better because we are better. And he believes we have to do better, if our freedom is to support genuine human flourishing.

How to do better? By recognizing that there is a moral logic built into the world and into us: a "natural law" that we can grasp by a disciplined reflection on the dynamics of human action.

In exploring this moral logic, John Paul is not given to dry abstractions. Rather, his understanding of the good life has emerged from a respectful examination of the ways in which real-life men and women act and react, live and love, fail, get up and try again.

"Veritatis Splendor" is the furthest thing possible from a scolding or a put-down. On the contrary, it is because John Paul takes the human drama so seriously that he is willing to make so daring a claim about the human capacity, under grace, to live a good life. Of course, we often fail to do the right thing. But the fact of failure — of sin, if you will — seems to John Paul no reason to lower the moral standard, for doing so diminishes our humanity and demeans our striving for goodness. The encyclical also makes clear that the church is, was and always will be a church of sinners who live by mercy and forgiveness alone. No one is being driven out of the Catholic Church by "Veritatis Splendor"; everyone in the church is being asked to accept Christianity as a comprehensive way of life, not a package of consumer options.

The central teaching of "Veritatis Splendor" — that we can know and do the right thing — is emphatically not for Catholics only. People need only look around to see the damage that moral relativism and skepticism can wreak on human lives: among the bored and disaffected suburban young, in the violence- and drug-plagued underclass, in children having children, in spousal and child abuse, in workplace sloth and boardroom fraud.

Can we Americans sustain our aspiration in ordered liberty if the only thing we agree upon is the rules by which we sue each other? Isn't some fundamental of moral consensus essential in a free society? Doesn't democracy depend on enough people being willing to do the right thing?

These concerns can hardly be dismissed as retrograde, unenlightened, "conservative." After all, it was the greatest of 19th century English Catholic liberals, Lord Acton, who taught that "freedom is not the power of doing what we like, but the right of being able to do what we ought." John Paul II agrees. The proposition is surely worth a serious look.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

The Why of Health Care

Regarding "Whatever Health Care Costs, Don't Let Freedom Suffer" (Opinion, Sept. 29):

I agree with William Safire's assertion that in the Clinton health care reform, four must pay for five. But that is the whole point of the reform: the current nonsystem leaves too many people without insurance.

As to why Mr. Clinton has chosen not to finance the reform through general tax revenue, I think the answer is clear: There is no political will in the United States to raise taxes.

Yet tax rates in the United States are among the lowest in the developed world, so the reluctance to raise them seems bizarre, especially at a time of huge budget deficits and increasing social problems in the United States. Much could be achieved if taxes could be raised to the level they were before Ronald Reagan and his voodoo economics overtook the country.

Clearly, the Clinton proposal is an attempt to create a politically viable reform. If the health care task force had been asked to design the perfect health care system, the proposal surely would have looked quite different.

But we have to work with what we have. In this case, the job is made more difficult by a chaotic system, dominated by powerful interest groups with much to lose in a reform that attempts to control costs.

I just hope that Congress realizes that passing this imperfect program will be much less damaging than continuing with the status quo while searching for a perfect proposal; the perfect proposal does not exist.

— ANNE STAEHR JOHANSEN, Copenhagen.

Frequent Spenders

Regarding "American Express Ducks Flyer-Plan Issue" (Oct. 1): What familiarity I have with international American Express dollar card holders leads me to suspect that this group is being punished by American Express for being their best customers. Those I know probably spend far more than the average customer in the United States. Could it be that Amexco is discriminating against its most frequent buyers? Its reluctance to be up front with international dollar card holders is disturbing.

— JOE WILLIAMS, Düsseldorf.

Constructive Criticism

Regarding "Cool the French-Bashing" (Opinion, Oct. 1) by Jean-Pierre Brunet: Ambassador Brunet's commentary presents excellent examples of the French national insecurity complex.

"French bashing" seems to describe an attack on the French people. I believe that "constructive criticism" is a better term, and even this criticism will end when the French get serious about domestic and international growth. They need to put an end to protectionist subsidies and the irrational belief that everyone is out to bash France.

— DAVID PICARD, Grenoble, France.

Yes, but Is It Art?

Regarding "CBS vs. Art World: Philistines at the Gate" (Back Page, Oct. 5):

Surely there are hundreds of artists, critics, curators and gallery owners who could have described the many reasons why art is not necessarily pretty, is often difficult to understand immediately, and is not what we expect. That would have been interesting and new.

Instead, the CBS program was consistently shallow, and Morley Safer seemed uninterested in anything but an easy laugh. Shame on "60 Minutes" for failing the public with such tired, cheap, marshmallow reporting.

— DAVID YOUTZ, Hong Kong.

No Risk of Starvation

Regarding "Born-Again Dining: A Hit, A Miss" (Aug. 27) by Patricia Wells:

I have long been a fan of Patricia Wells, but as a 7th-arrondissement resident, student at the Cordon Bleu, and mother of a chef, I want to dispute her comment that "decent restaurants" in the 7th "are virtually nonexistent, and one could starve to death on any given night."

So sweeping a statement does a disservice to the small neighborhood establishments which offer fine food, a warm welcome and service as good as that found in many of the places she recommends. Both the Michelin and Gault-Millau guides give high marks to several restaurants in the higher-price category in the neighborhood, but it is the little neighborhood places that make dining out in Paris such a joy. If this is "starvation," we could all die happy.

Half-year results

Orders rise for seventh successive quarter

In the first half-year of 1993, Ericsson's orders and invoiced sales were up sharply on the corresponding period of 1992.

Order bookings were SEK 34,036 m, up 27%. Consolidated net sales were SEK 27,394 m, up by 35%. Pre-tax income for the period was SEK 1,227 m.

This is the seventh successive quarter in which the company's order intake has increased. For the full year 1993, the company expects income to be at least double that of 1992.

It's a notable achievement in the face of the world recession.

Commenting on the half-year results, Chief Executive Dr Lars Ramqvist focused attention on the vital role played by leading-edge technology.

Total network capability embraces all the key telecoms technologies

Ericsson offers a total capability in the systems needed for profitable, long-term telecoms network and service development.

It's based on a sustained commitment to R&D in all the key areas of telecoms technology.

The office telephones. The mobile phone. The phone at home.

Different services. Different products. Different networks. Right?

Well, so far, yes.

But there are changes on the way that have profound implications for telecoms service providers and users alike. Changes that will remove, or at least blur, the demarcation lines we today take for granted.

Increasing liberalization of telecoms markets around the world means today's customers have an expanding choice of competitive services. At the same time, telecoms services play an increasingly strategic role in businesses of all sizes.

As a result, the telecoms networks

'The rate of change is extremely fast in our industry,' he explained. 'To maintain success in the market, it is essential to lead in the field of technological development.'

'As telecommunications systems become more complex, with more services and demands for operating and support systems, customers are showing increased interest and confidence in our advanced, high-quality systems.'

The best measure of this positive market attitude is Ericsson's business results. All three of the company's main business areas — public telecoms, radio communications and business networks — reported increases in net sales and order bookings over the first half year.

Radio communications showed particularly strong growth, with a 75% increase in sales. It now ranks as the largest of the company's business areas in terms of sales.

Mobile telephony is an important element of that success. During the second quarter of 1993, many new system expansion orders were signed. There were also orders for new digital mobile telephone systems in the US, Japan and Europe.

Demand for the Ericsson AXE system continued to be strong, with major orders from China, Thailand and Spain. Bulgaria became the 104th country to use AXE.

demands more intelligent fixed networks that can track and validate subscribers as they make and receive calls at various locations. They may be using radio-connected portable telephones: equally they may be using a wired connection.

Over-all, in a more competitive marketplace, network operators and service providers will be striving to bring new services to market as quickly and economically as possible. That implies network infrastructures that are more flexible — responding more dynamically to changing needs — and more economic. Clearly, network and service management will become increasingly important.

The key areas for the future are multimedia switching, radio, transport and network management.

Sustained investment in all these areas is already giving Ericsson a market-leading technology edge.

Developing China's telecom infrastructure

Figures just released by Ericsson illustrate the extent of the company's involvement in China's telecoms modernisation programme.

There are nearly 3.5 m Ericsson AXE exchange lines in service and on order in public telecom networks in nine Chinese provinces.

Ericsson's cellular mobile telephone systems are being supplied to 11 provinces. This autumn, the company will ship the first commercial GSM mobile telephone network, for Guangdong province.

Ericsson's MD110 digital PBX system is widely in service in state and private organisations. The current MD110 installed base in China is around 800,000 lines.

Local Investment

Most of the MD110 equipment sold in China is already manufactured locally, through a co-operation with Beijing Wire and Communications Plant. In May this year, this co-operation was extended with a new six-year contract that also covers Ericsson's Business Phone PBX systems for small and medium-sized companies.

Joint ventures have also recently been established in Nanjing and Guangzhou. The US$ 30 m joint venture Nanjing Ericsson Communications Co Ltd will manufacture a complete range of cellular communications products including the AXE switch.

Another joint venture signed in August this year will create a local engineering and support capability for AXE exchanges in the Liaoning province city of Dalian.

The development of the Chinese telecom infrastructure is a top national priority: by the year 2000 the goal is to have a network with capacity approaching 100 million lines. This investment plan makes China potentially the world's biggest single telecoms market.

Ericsson's trading relationship with China dates back to the 1890s, when the first telephone sets were delivered to Shanghai.

The company is determined to build on that 100-year association, and remain a major contributor to this latest phase of China's telecoms development.

Personal radio alarm for at-risk personnel

An innovative new radio security device developed by Ericsson in the Netherlands lets lone workers summon immediate help, and identifies their exact location. Called Dircall, the system has been awarded the iON award for good industrial design, as well as the IFSEC award for 'creativity, innovation and a clear awareness of customer requirements'.

World round-up

India: Two years after supplying four international gateway exchanges to Videah Sanchar Nigam Limited, India's international traffic operator, Ericsson has won a breakthrough order from the Department of Telecommunications to supply AXE local exchanges for the New Delhi public network. The contract covers 100,000 exchange lines, including ISDN facilities.

USA: Ericsson GE has won its biggest ever order for the EDACS digital trunked radio system. The US$ 39 m system in Dade County, Florida, will provide state-wide communications for police and fire departments, emergency medical services, county transit systems and all public works functions.

Hungary: This year, the EDACS system will also enter service in Budapest, Hungary. It is the first phase of a network that will eventually support police, fire brigade and public sector communications over the whole of Hungary.

In a separate contract, Ericsson Technika Ltd is to supply AXE exchanges valued at US$ 26 m for use in Budapest and the rest of the country. Ericsson is the major switch supplier to Hungary.

Bulgaria: Bulgaria has become the 104th national market for Ericsson's AXE exchange. Ericsson S.A., Spain, is to supply exchanges and associated TMOs network management systems, worth SEK 135 m as part of the country's Digital Overlay Network (DON) project to upgrade the national telecommunications network.

Thailand: Thai Telephone and Telecommunications (TT&T) has awarded Ericsson a US$ 130 m contract to supply an AXE network with TMOs network management.

Sweden: Ericsson Radar Electronics has been awarded a development contract worth nearly US$ 80 m for the surveillance and fire control radars, in Sweden's new RBS 23 BAMSE air defense missile system.

Philippines: Ericsson has received a US$ 78 m contract from the Philippine Long Distance Telephone Company, covering engineering, supply, installation and testing of cable networks.

In a separate development, Ericsson Radio Systems has signed a Memorandum of Understanding with Smart Information Technologies for supply and installation of a TACS cellular mobile telephone system in the Philippines.

Tokyo Pulls the Plug On Overtime Work

Tokyo's city government turned the lights out on overtime this week, plunging offices into darkness as a reminder to overworked employees to go home. A city official said the lights would be switched off at 6 P.M. every Wednesday, now decreed "no-overtime day."

Overtime is common in Japanese offices. Workers are often loath to go home earlier than their bosses for fear of showing bad form. The Japanese government is encouraging shorter working hours to help workers enjoy life more and to stimulate the economy by giving them more time to spend money.

Starting this week, in Tokyo municipal offices, it was announced at 5:30 P.M. over the public address system that lights would go off in half an hour. Regular hours for municipal employees are 8:30 A.M. to 5:30 P.M., five days a week.

However, workers can still burn the midnight oil. Late-stayers can manually turn the lights back on if they feel they must work past 6 P.M.

Chinese burn huge amounts of imitation paper money at funerals and religious festivals; the tradition is that it will reach their deceased relatives. France Says It Can't Maintain Nuclear Test Ban Indefinitely

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

PARIS — As a committee of French legislators on Thursday pressed for a resumption of nuclear tests by the end of the year, the country's defense minister said his government was not yet prepared to sign a treaty forbidding such tests.

Defense Minister François Léotard said that for now France's nuclear force was "in no way threatened" by maintaining a moratorium, but that the nation could not continue "indefinitely" without nuclear tests.

"At the right time, it will be necessary to proceed with several tests, probably of a weak caliber," he said.

The French debate over resuming nuclear testing was muffled until a Chinese test Tuesday that broke the moratorium, first called for by France in April 1992 and respected by the five principal nuclear powers — the United States, Britain and Russia as well as China and France. President François Mitterrand has said France would renew testing if another country did so.

A joint statement Wednesday by Mr. Mitterrand and Prime Minister Edouard Balladur ordered consultations with the United States, Russia and Britain.

Mr. Léotard said France would not sign a treaty forbidding all testing until it had the laser and computer technology to simulate tests. He added that it was difficult to estimate how long that would take, but he said such technology was not likely to be available for at least six years.

France's aim is to replace underground blasts with laboratory simulations.

"Before we do this, we will need at one point to carry out several tests, probably very small ones, to verify our experiments," Mr. Léotard said.

He said the blasts to confirm simulation would probably each have a yield of about one kiloton. By comparison, the bomb dropped by the United States on Hiroshima in 1945 had a yield of 15 kilotons.

Mr. Léotard noted that the 1994 defense budget called for 280 million francs ($48 million) in credit for the French simulation program.

International negotiations on an eventual treaty forbidding nuclear testing are to get under way in Geneva in January.

In a hearing before Mr. Léotard, the majority of members of the National Assembly's Defense Committee said they were in favor of a resumption of nuclear tests before 1994.

Renewed testing is necessary in the near future "so that the series of absolutely necessary tests are finished as quickly as possible," a committee statement said.

The committee said that most members believed that while the moratorium does not hurt the credibility of France's nuclear force, it is compromising plans to put new weapons into service.

"The longer the interruption of testing, the more difficult a restart will be," the statement said.

Mr. Mitterrand suspended French nuclear testing at the Mururoa Atoll site in the South Pacific in April 1992 in a gesture to France's growing environmental movement. The move was also welcomed by Australia and New Zealand, critics of French policy. (AP, Reuters)

China Pledges 'Restraint'

BEIJING (Reuters) — China on Thursday rejected criticism of its decision to resume nuclear testing, saying its atomic program should not be put "under the magnifying glass" in a world of larger nuclear powers.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman, Wu Jianmin, said Beijing took no stand on the possibility that other countries might follow and resume their nuclear testing programs. "That is their own business," he said.

Mr. Wu said China planned to continue to move ahead with its nuclear test program "as always, with utmost restraint." He said the relatively limited nature of China's atomic program should exempt it from criticism.

"Among the five nuclear states, China has adopted the smallest number of nuclear tests," he said. "It is unfair to put what China does under a magnifying glass."

He added that China still hoped a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty might be negotiated by 1996.

Irish Leader Backs Ulster Initiative

By James F. Clarity

New York Times Service

DUBLIN — Prime Minister Albert Reynolds of the Irish Republic on Thursday praised a new peace initiative for Northern Ireland and said he would discuss it with Britain.

The initiative was advanced by the two most influential Roman Catholic leaders in the north, John Hume, head of the moderate Social Democratic Labor Party, and Gerry Adams, president of the outlawed Irish Republican Army.

Details of the initiative were not disclosed, but it was widely believed to include conditions for a cease-fire in the guerrilla war between the IRA and British forces.

The violence between the British province's Protestant majority and its Catholic minority has killed more than 3,000 people in the past 25 years.

Mr. Reynolds was briefed on the initiative on Thursday by Mr. Hume.

Later, the prime minister, referring to a written report Mr. Hume had given him, said: "This document, setting out the broad principles to which all of us agreed, could be a just and lasting peace process to be established and worked upon."

"We will evaluate what we have heard today with our colleagues in government," Mr. Reynolds said, "and we will consider how, in our discussions with the British government, this can contribute to the building of a peace process."

Mr. Reynolds's approval of the Hume-Adams initiative was crucial because without it the British Northern Ireland secretary, Sir Patrick Mayhew, would have been under little pressure to consider it.

Many political officials and academic analysts feel that if Britain considers the initiative, that will constitute a change in the British policy of refusing to negotiate with Sinn Féin unless it first denounced the IRA's campaign of violence.

Protestant leaders in the north, who want the province to remain part of Britain and fear the new initiative's goal of uniting Ireland, have already charged that if Mr. Mayhew considers a proposal that Mr. Adams helped prepare, he would, in effect, be negotiating with Sinn Féin.

Mr. Mayhew has said that while he "would be an idiot" if he did not at least look at anything the Irish government passed on to him, there was no assurance that Britain would agree with anything in the proposals.

The focus of British and Irish policy has been they would not negotiate with Sinn Féin until there had been a cease-fire long enough to convince them that the IRA was sincere, as well as the renunciation of violence by Sinn Féin.

Mr. Adams has refused to do this, saying that while he is for a political settlement, he understands the necessity for "armed struggle."

Mr. Adams, as an IRA official, was freed from prison in 1972 and flown to London, with other IRA leaders, for talks with officials in the government of Edward Heath. The talks failed, and a brief cease-fire gave way to new violence.

China Responds Mildly to Warning on Hong Kong

By Kevin Murphy

International Herald Tribune

HONG KONG — China responded in measured tones Thursday to a British pledge to engineer Hong Kong electoral change without Beijing's approval, if necessary.

China offered no concessions in their yearlong dispute but no new virulence either.

"We hope that the British side will take a truly constructive attitude toward the talks so as to narrow the gaps as early as possible and make the talks a success," a Foreign Ministry spokesman, Wu Jianmin, said.

Hong Kong had been bracing for a fiery Beijing reaction after the colony's governor, Chris Patten, said Wednesday that only a short time remained before arrangements for elections in 1994 and 1995 had to be completed and that China needed to make genuine efforts to end the impasse.

Instead, the colony received a muted response that contrasted with Beijing's attacks on Mr. Patten's proposals for change when he first raised them last year.

In Beijing, Mr. Wu said that "the essence of the current dispute between China and Britain is not whether there should be democracy, but whether one should honor his words," China's Xinhua news agency reported.

Mr. Patten began a public campaign Thursday to win support for his proposals. The Associated Press reported from Hong Kong.

"I hope that Chinese officials will recognize that time does march relentlessly on," he told members of the Legislative Council, "that we can't allow ourselves to get into a position where we can't make proper arrangements for the '94 and '95 elections because the calendar has moved past us."

In addition to meeting with legislators, he appeared on a radio call-in program and spoke at a public meeting.

In his policy speech last year Mr. Patten proposed a number of changes, including lowering the voting age to 18; increasing the number of directly elected seats on the Legislative Council; widening the number of seats held by functional constituencies, which are organized among professional and industry groups; and abolishing appointed membership on municipal councils.

China holds that any changes in the electoral system made without its acquiescence would violate previous agreements with Britain on Hong Kong's future after 1997, when the colony returns to Chinese rule.

Referring to a recently published threat by Deng Xiaoping, China's senior leader, to retake Hong Kong before 1997 if it became unstable, the Foreign Ministry spokesman said this was "far-sighted and still constructive as regarding the current political situation."

But investors, unperturbed by uncertainty over the colony's future, pushed the key Hang Seng Index of stocks to 8066.79, its fifth consecutive record close. (Page 15)

Cambodians Say No to French Class

Reuters

PHNOM PENH — About 1,000 Cambodian students, eager to study English, took to the streets Thursday in a peaceful protest against compulsory French language classes at their technical institute.

It was the first mass demonstration seen in Phnom Penh since government police and army units suppressed an anti-corruption protest in December 1991.

The students were angry that French-promised educational assistance to their school was contingent on their learning the language of their former colonial masters.

"All the students at the institute of technology want to learn English," said Sen, a fourth-year engineering student. "The French language cannot help the students."

He accused the French government of harboring a "colonial attitude" toward Cambodia and of using stealth to spread "French influence."

"Around the world about 90 percent of students are learning the English language," the student said. "French does not help us develop."

Earlier this year, King Norodom Sihanouk had pledged that Cambodia — which was a French colony until 1955 — would become a member of the French-speaking community of nations.

The move was popular with older Cambodians but is not universally so.

"I don't understand Sihanouk," said a student called Rihy. "He wants the country to speak French."

The march through the center of the city was observed by amused police and army personnel, who did not interfere.

Outside the Education Ministry, student leaders chanted demands for changes to the national language curriculum. Then they marched on the National Assembly to take up their grievances with lawmakers.

Loudspeakers mounted on bicycles blared anti-French slogans and called for English to replace French as the official second language.

English is by far the most popular second language in Cambodia.

Scores of backyard English schools teach capacity crowds each night in Phnom Penh.

Bonn Wants East In Updated NATO

Reuters

MAINZ, Germany — A reformed NATO must extend stability to as many of its former East European foes as possible and make Russia a strategic partner, Defense Minister Volker Rühe of Germany said Thursday.

Mr. Rühe said that a January meeting of the alliance must take into account Russian security in considering whether to offer membership to East European states.

"This concept of stability transfer is not directed against anybody," he said at the end of a three-day annual meeting of German military leaders.

"It will benefit all," he said. "We are not talking about new members for the old NATO, which stood against the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact, but about new members of a new NATO in a strategic partnership with Russia."

Mr. Rühe said that NATO should also be restructured for future cooperation with nonmembers, such as Sweden and Finland, who do not seek to join the 16-nation alliance.

"It is important that NATO make clear at its summit that it is no closed society but that it declares itself ready in principle to open up," Mr. Rühe said.

Germany is a leading advocate of eventually opening up the alliance to Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic and Slovakia.

But President Boris N. Yeltsin of Russia, under pressure from the military, signaled his opposition to NATO's accepting East European states as members after first giving Poland the green light to join.

"Russia is a very important factor for lasting stability in Europe as shown in the past few days," Mr. Rühe said. "We will achieve stability only with, not against, Russia. Russia will not and must not be blocked out from the European process."

The issue of membership will come up at the January summit meeting in Brussels, partly at Germany's insistence.

"Preemptive crisis management for us Germans means that we move the Western stability zone as far as possible to the East," Mr. Rühe said. "It is not in Germany's interest to remain a state on the eastern fringes of the Western prosperity zone."

"We Germans are the first to feel the consequences of instability in the East," Mr. Rühe added.

Mr. Yeltsin said in a letter last week to key NATO governments, including Germany and the United States, that he did not favor expanding the alliance eastward. He suggested instead that Russia and NATO should jointly guarantee Eastern Europe's security.

In Paris, Foreign Minister Alain Juppé said Thursday that the European Community should take up a French-proposed security pact for the Continent before NATO admits any new nations from the former Communist bloc.

In an interview in the daily Liberation, Mr. Juppé said European defense structures must be widened, but in a progressive fashion after first examining a plan for European security put forward by Prime Minister Edouard Balladur.

Mondale Puts Onus On Japan

New Envoy Urges Action on Trade

Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches

TOKYO — Walter F. Mondale, the new U.S. ambassador to Tokyo, used his first meeting with news organizations here to underline U.S. hopes for serious action by Japan to ease the chronic trade imbalance.

"The United States is doing its part to solve its economic problems," said Mr. Mondale, who assumed his duties as ambassador last month. "In turn, we look to Japan for progress on its own economic agenda."

In the next few weeks, Japanese and U.S. negotiators will be tackling ranking trade issues as they prepare for formal talks aimed at slashing Japan's trade surplus with the United States, which reached $50 billion last year.

Mr. Mondale said the Clinton administration had fulfilled its pledges to improve its export competitiveness by enacting or proposing measures to cut the U.S. budget deficit, improve productivity, reform health care and streamline government bureaucracy.

He urged Japan in particular to replace its foreign rice ban with import tariffs.

But he also expressed sympathy for Japanese farmers devastated by a poor rice crop. A wet, cold summer has shattered Japan's rice crop.

"I grew up in a rural community," the former vice president said. Then, alluding to the pain of a bad harvest, he added: "And I know how much it hurts."

The rice shortage has forced Japan to import 200,000 metric tons of industrial-grade rice this year, the first time it has agreed to emergency rice imports since 1984.

Tokyo bans all commercial imports of rice and opposes a draft plan under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to replace all non-tariff barriers on agricultural imports with tariffs.

Mr. Mondale said the United States hoped Japan would swiftly implement its $7 billion year ($57 billion) economic stimulus package announced last month.

The former vice president said he was confident that Japan and the United States would be able to work to correct the economic imbalance.

As part of a July pact to implement a new "framework" of economic relations, Japan and the United States agreed to seek agreements by early 1994 on autos, government procurement and access for foreign insurance companies.

Japan's construction market is another area of controversy. The U.S. government has threatened to impose sanctions against Japanese companies in November if its demands for a complete opening of bidding on Japan's public works projects are not met.

A series of arrests on charges of bribery and bid-rigging in public works projects has reinforced U.S. suspicions that foreign companies are being locked out of the Japanese market.

Asked whether targets on Japanese purchases of U.S.-made semiconductors and car parts had been met, Mr. Mondale said the timetable had been met to date.

He described talks in Hawaii last month on a framework for economic ties as a preliminary meeting.

Referring to trade talks to be held in Tokyo next week, Mr. Mondale said, "That's when serious negotiations start. We expect that we'll be on schedule."

"Beloved"

"She told me all my daddy's things. How hard he worked to buy her. After the cake was ruined and the ironed clothes all messed up, and after I heard my sister crawling up the stairs to get back to her bed, she told me my things too. That I was charmed. My birth was and I got saved all the time. And that I shouldn't be afraid of the ghost. It wouldn't harm me because I tasted its blood when Ma'am nursed me. She said the ghost was after Ma'am and her too for not doing anything to stop it. But it would never hurt me. I just had to watch out for it because it was a greedy ghost and needed a lot of love, which was only natural, considering. And I do. Love her. I do. She played with me and always came to be with me whenever I needed her. She's mine. Beloved. She's mine."

"The mirror by the door was not a mirror by the door, it was an altar where he stood for only a moment to put on his cap before going out. The red rocking chair was a rocking of his own hips as he sat in the kitchen. Still, there was nothing of his — his own that she could find. It was as if she were afraid she had hallucinated him and needed proof to the contrary. His absence was everywhere, stinging everything, giving the furnishings primary colors, sharp outlines to the corners of rooms and gold-light to the dust collecting on table tops. When he was there he pulled everything toward himself. Not only her eyes and all her senses but also inanimate things seemed to exist because of him, backdrops to his presence. Now that he had gone, these things, so long subdued by his presence, were glorified in his wake."

"Song of Solomon"

"Pretty woman, he thought. Pretty little black-skinned woman. Who wanted to kill for love, die for love. The pride, the conceit of these doormat women amazed him. They were always women who had been spoiled children. Whose whims had been taken seriously by adults and who grew up to be the stingiest, greediest people on earth and out of their stinginess grew their stung little love that ate everything in sight. They could not believe or accept the fact that they were unloved; they believed that the world itself was off balance when it appeared as though they were not loved. Why did they think they were so lovable? Why did they think their brand of love was better than, or even as good as, anybody else's? But they did. And they loved their love so much they would kill anybody who got in its way."

"Jazz"

"The right record is on the turntable now, she can hear its preparatory hiss as the needle slides toward its first groove. The brothers smile brilliantly; one leans a fraction of an inch toward the other, and never losing eye contact with Dorcas, whispers something. The other looks Dorcas up and down as she moves toward them. Then, just as the music, slow and smoky, loads up the air, his smile bright as ever, he wrinkles his nose and turns away."

France Cites 'Multiple' U.S. Errors in Somalia

By Youssef M. Ibrahim
New York Times Service

PARIS — France on Thursday strongly criticized American military conduct in Somalia, calling for replacing military confrontation with a dialogue that includes representatives of the fugitive warlord General Mohammed Farah Aidid.

France also said it had rejected a plea by the UN secretary-general, Boutros Boutros Ghali, to keep a military contingent of 1,100 soldiers in Somalia, saying it will pull its troops out before January.

In unusually strong remarks, the French defense minister, François Léotard, said that American military operations in Somalia were riddled with "multiple errors" and "excesses" that caused the United Nations to deviate from its original mission to feed starving Somalis.

"It is an operation which is little by little deviating from its initial objectives, becoming marked by inadmissible confrontations and military attitudes that are incomprehensible," Mr. Léotard said.

"There are many faults and excesses in these operations which do not seem proper to us," he said.

Mr. Léotard added that "this way of treating this type of crisis does not, at the moment, conform with the situation on the ground."

Last week, the French foreign minister, Alain Juppé, had signaled disagreement with the UN role in Somalia when he said "military revenge" against troops loyal to General Aidid had become the dominant feature of the UN operation, displacing the humanitarian goal of the international presence in that country.

But the comments Thursday by Mr. Léotard were the strongest criticism leveled yet by a senior official of the conservative administration of Prime Minister Edouard Balladur against the U.S. policy in Somalia.

Richard Druce, spokesman for the Foreign Ministry, said Thursday that efforts to seek a "national reconciliation" in Somalia must include various armed factions there, among them followers of General Aidid.

German Troops to Stay

The German government said Thursday that it had made no plans to withdraw its troops from Somalia but said it was in contact with allies on the worsening situation for UN peacekeepers there, Reuters reported from Mainz, Germany.

Defense Minister Volker Rühe said the 1,700 German logistic troops based in Belet Uen central Somalia would remain despite the deaths of American and other UN soldiers in Mogadishu, 300 kilometers to the south.

CLINTON: Buildup and Pullout supplies and people moving freely," the president said.

Mr. Clinton also said the troops would "keep the pressure on those who cut off relief supplies and attack our people."

Although White House aides said Mr. Clinton intended to move U.S. troops out of the business of hunting down General Mohammed Farah Aidid, the Somali clan leader, Defense Secretary Les Aspin specifically warned General Aidid in a statement to journalists: "Do not underestimate American resolve."

But Mr. Aspin also stressed that U.S. forces would be used to further the political goal of a self-sufficient Somalia, not to roam Mogadishu in offensive operations.

Mr. Clinton said there was no guarantee that his plan would work. But he also said: "Make no mistake about it, if we were to leave Somalia tomorrow, other nations would leave, too. Chaos would resume, the relief effort would stop and starvation soon would return."

Mr. Clinton's plan will undoubtedly put pressure on the United Nations. It was learned that Washington's chief representative to the United Nations, Madeleine K. Albright, delivered a blunt message to Secretary-General Boutros Boutros Ghali in a meeting Wednesday night, stating essentially that the United Nations needed to sharpen both its military efficiency in Somalia and its diplomatic efforts to rebuild a Somali government.

Until now, U.S. policy was to remain in Somalia until Mogadishu was calm, until "real progress" had been made disarming Somali clan members and until a "credible" police force was on duty there.

Jonathan T. Howe, a retired U.S. admiral who is leading the UN mission in Somalia, said in a broadcast interview that six more months of U.S. military support would be "critical" to permit the United Nations "to really shore up and get all its forces in order." He termed current security conditions there "fragile."

Representative Ronald V. Dellums, a California Democrat who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said Mr. Clinton in the meeting with lawmakers had "indicated that one important mistake that was made was this extraordinary UN preoccupation with seeking out Aidid."

Mr. Dellums said it would be "a great challenge" to establish secure relief supply lines in Somalia within the six-month period envisioned by the president.

The House speaker, Thomas S. Foley of Washington, called the morning session "the longest continuous consultation on a foreign policy and security issue that I've experienced in Congress in 29 years."

have destroyed all of General Aidid's known weapons depots in the city. Now officials are conceding that he and his militia probably had a lot more hidden stockpiles around the city than they had initially believed.

Admiral Howe also said it was a "bum rap" that Malaysian and Pakistani troops had been criticized for having taken several hours to rescue the trapped rangers Sunday. He called the rescue operation "a good example of the United Nations pulling together."

"This was the right thing to do," Admiral Howe said. "They regrouped, planned. I think it's a rum rap that they didn't go instantly to their rescue."

by the United States and other forces in Somalia. But that proposal had already been rejected by UN officials.

"About the pilot, we are going to deal with the United States, not with the United Nations," Mr. Abdulatif said. "We are requesting United States troops to release the hundreds of Somali civilians in their custody and accept to cease the hostility and resolve the matter peacefully."

Max Hadorn, chief delegate for the International Committee of the Red Cross in Mogadishu, said reports that other Americans had been captured were not confirmed. He said the Red Cross had had "quite a few negotiations" on seeing Mr. Durant. "I am quite confident something will happen."

Mr. Durant's helicopter was shot down during a raid that captured 24 Somali militiamen, including three senior Aidid aides. Thirteen U.S. soldiers were killed in the operation.

A Malaysian soldier was also killed in the battle and 75 Americans and 8 other UN peacekeepers were wounded.

Casualties among the Somalis in the battle were believed to be high. "We estimate there were 700 wounded, a third of them women and children," Mr. Hadorn said. "If you have 700 wounded, then you certainly have about 200 dead."

The Red Cross is staying in touch with some 180 Somalis detained by the United Nations. Mr. Hadorn said, adding that the organization was establishing first aid centers around the city in case of further fighting.

PAKISTAN: Bhutto, With Plurality, Sets Out to Form a Government

Mr. Sharif, some important trends emerged out of the elections.

The Islamic fundamentalist parties fared worse than in other recent elections, a rebuke by voters of their efforts to transform the moderate Pakistan into a stricter Islamic state. One party ran on the platform that it would build a nuclear bomb and campaigned with a giant post of a nuclear missile with the notation "To India, With Love" painted across its side.

"It's a sign that our system is developing into an economic and social system rather than an ideological system," said Anshad Syed Karim, chairman of the political science department at Karachi University. "We're seeing more open and progressive development."

In the next two weeks, Miss Bhutto, leader of the Pakistan People's Party, and Mr. Sharif, who heads the Pakistan Muslim League, will be engaged in a political scramble to win, woo and — some fear — buy political support for their efforts to forge a new government.

The tight national elections, which left no party with a controlling majority in the National Assembly, gave new importance to provincial elections on Saturday.

In Punjab, the most populous and most politically strategic of the four main provinces, Mr. Sharif's party is considered significantly stronger than Miss Bhutto's. If Mr. Sharif, 44, can maintain control of the powerful Punjab assembly, it could mean ongoing political conflict with a central government controlled by Miss Bhutto's party.

The election came at a turning point in the history of the struggling democracy, which faces serious economic and political challenges at home, even as it is attempting to redefine its role in the post-Cold War world.

Pakistan is under increasing pressure from the United States to control rampant drug trafficking and suppress terrorism at the same time that the U.S. Congress refuses to resume military and other aid because of concerns over its nuclear program.

"Pakistan is facing a crisis over what democracy means," said Paul

R. Newberg, a senior associate at the Carnegie Foundation for International Peace and a member of the international team of election observers sent here to monitor Pakistan's third national election in five years. "Bhutto's first order of business is putting together a government voters and outsiders feel they can trust. If she doesn't pull together a coalition government, nobody can take her seriously."

Miss Bhutto was not the only member of her feudal family to win election to the National Assembly this week. Her husband, mother and father-in-law also won seats. Her brother, who ran for office from Syria where he is living in exile because of terrorism and hijacking charges in Pakistan, lost his election bid.

later during the Civil War. With no defining port, river or mountain, Atlanta cannot ever become a Crescent City or Rocky Mountain High.

The city's most enduring imagery has to do with Margaret Mitchell's novel "Gone With the Wind," but in a city this is almost 70 percent black, something harking back to minstrel shows and hoodlums does not have much of a constituency.

As the slogan search has dragged on, almost everyone has weighed in. A recent letters page in The Atlanta Journal-Constitution offered suggestions varying from "Atlanta: Southern Pride" to "Atlanta: Y'all Come!" to an ingrate's offering of "Atlanta: The City Too Stupid to Be Ashamed."

At the Nuclifora Group's office in a suburban high-rise, three bulging binders hold the 5,000 or so submissions. There are some themes, like peaches ("Atlanta: It's a Peach."), the South ("Southern Champs... Open Arms, Atlanta"), Martin Luther King's dream ("Atlanta: The City of Dreams") and youthful prosperity ("Atlanta: Our Time Has Come").

Some come on a bit strong, like the Ramboesque "Atlanta: Conquering the World." Others, like "Atlanta: Not Bad for Georgia," or "Atlanta: We're Better Than Birmingham," perhaps fall a bit short in projecting the requisite world-classness. Still others ("Watch Atlanta Transmogrify") aren't exactly poetry.

Still, Atlanta is generally upbeat and optimistic enough that even nonmarketing types tend to get in the spirit of things.

NOBEL: Panel Selects Morrison which won the National Book Critics Circle Award, and "Tar Baby" (1981).

These works were followed by "Beloved," the story of a runaway slave who, when captured, cuts her daughter's throat rather than see her grow up in slavery.

"I think she got the Nobel Prize for two books, essentially, 'Beloved' and 'Jazz,'" Mr. Gates said. "Jazz" is a truly brilliant postmodern book. Imagine combining Eliot, Faulkner and Maria Calas. That's the voice that emerges."

He continued: "She's a masterful craftsman, which people tend to overlook. She is as great and as innovative as Faulkner and Marquez and Woolf. That's why she deserved the Nobel Prize."

The choice of Ms. Morrison came as something of a surprise. Speculation in the Swedish press had focused on four candidates: the Irish poet Seamus Heaney, who has been regarded as a front-runner for several years; Hugo Claus, a Belgian poet, playwright and novelist who writes in Flemish; Bei Dao, an exiled Chinese poet; and Ali Said Adonis, a Syrian-born Lebanese poet.

Ms. Morrison said that she had risen at about 4:30 A.M. to write and a few hours later was startled to hear the phone ring. "I knew it was terrible news," she said. "And when a friend of mine on the other end said, 'Did you hear? then I knew it was something awful. It took a long time for me to accept it.'"

Some hours later, the permanent secretary of the Swedish Academy called her to confirm that the prize had been awarded to her.

The Nobel laureates for medicine, economics, chemistry and physics will be announced in Stockholm next week, and the Norwegian Nobel Committee will announce the recipient of the 1993 peace prize Oct. 15 in Oslo.

Did You Say Nightlife? Euro Disney's Flip Side

Festival Area Serves Up Drinks And Music and Stays Open Late

By Mike Zwerin
International Herald Tribune

MARNE-LA-VALLEE, France — The unlikely urge to approve of something having to do with the name Disney began to take hold — slowly, inescapably, painfully, like a migraine — in a side-show called Festival Disney, which is across an artificial lake from a sprawling Hiltonized Hyattsville Holiday Inn country-club-like compound with more hotel rooms than the city of Cannes.

At about the same time, two dogs answering to the name of Goofy were staggering suspiciously on their way from Festival Disney to listen to a jazz band in a hotel named — even more suspiciously — The New York. Why all the suspicion? (I've played them myself with a jazz band). Illusion has its limits.

Festival Disney borders the main event, the Euro Disney theme park. The border is unarmored (no admission charge). Jean-Luc Choplin, the vice president in charge, describes it as a "360-degree stage covered by a canopy of lights like a small ground-hugging piece of the cosmos. It has its own identity, a sort of postmodernist collage built of contemporary materials like aluminum and glass. The concept is like a modern circus tent, I compare it to a Rauschenberg painting."

Is that clear? No? Try this. Imagine Disney disguised as its fierce competitor Universal Studios, which considers its theme parks substantially hipper. In the United States, for example, Universal permits its male employees to wear facial hair, and you can find beer inside the park itself. Festival Disney, a sort of Disneyland for adults, has relaxed the rules to Universalize its image. A small step for Disneyland-kind of motion by Choplin, who is a former administrator of the Paris Opéra Ballet.

Even though the name Disney symbolizes the plague that brought many of us to live in France in the first place, it is sort of nice having its Euro-incarnation out there providing jobs and tax revenue. But I felt no desire to go to the end of the RER suburban line to observe another species of the same bug I love up roots to escape. Daytime would have been bad enough, all those dwarf-minded Euro-brats wearing Mickey and Minnie ears and Annie Oakley chape oling Snow White and Indiana Jones. Nighttime was out of the question. The entire concept is based on the assumption that it is always morning in Marne-la-Vallee.

The first time I heard that anything at all happened here after sundown was when a singer of my acquaintance was ordered to shave his moustache or else get out of this town before sunup. This being a recession, the moustache was made redundant. Thanks to Choplin, who was appointed to this job in July, plus general European realities, such policies are being reassessed.

If your car should turn into a pumpkin around midnight on these roads and you are not allergic to country music, Buffalo Bill revivals or technopop, you may be surprised to find yourself being thankful to be "stuck." You just might have what my mother used to call — in a tone of sincere admiration, usually while sipping a Manhattan through a straw — a "splendidly sinful time." On the other hand, if you are moved by Chet Baker, attend screenings of Ingmar Bergman films or read Eudora Welty under a willow tree, get that pumpkin pumping fast and head straight back to Montparnasse. Well, even so, as long as you're here, look around.

Hotel rooms accommodating a family of four cost $100 to $200, depending on season and category. The Chicago Steak House ("Quality Meat Purveyors") flies in four tons of beef a month. American meat, they say, is sweeter than European. A juggler works the aisles.

Festival Disney is also host to Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show, a "spectacular dinner show where the West comes to life complete with cowboys, native American Indians, bison and a delicious barbecue" (300 francs, or about $52, for adults, 200 francs for children including the barbecue).

Buffalo Bill, Sitting Bull and the other Native Americans and cowboys clowning in their show wander into Billy Bob's afterward and dance to a country music band. This may not be your cup of moonshine, but it's free.

There is no obligation to spend one Euro. The same for the Hurricane, a discotheque with recorded technopop including real false hurricanes once a night, complete with images of disaster on video screens and high-tech high-force winds.

It's hard to imagine anything cornier than this sort of thing, but it's free. You can pay for a hotel room, a steak and Buffalo Bill if you want to, but the rest is gratis. And the help is helpful, optional refreshments are not overpriced, the spaces are clean and not oversold.

I tend to be in the minority. The minority seems to me to be the only sensible place to be. There are lines I will not get in even if what people are lining up for attracts me. Counseling anybody to join the majority hurts, particularly with the name Disney attached to it. But hype in show business gets so exaggerated that you even get to appreciate honest vulgarity. Whatever gets you through the night, if you don't mind being one of 11 million customers a year lining up for it.

Kitsch notwithstanding, the comportment of the customers, generally sympathetic middle-class people having neither a boring nor sinful time, gives you new faith in mankind's ability to act like human beings.

Consider the Franco-American cultural conflict. "Culture is an exchange," says Choplin. "French culture today is a combination of Spanish, Italian, Belgian, American and many others. We want Festival Disney to embody this exchange. There should be no frontiers for culture. In January, we will have our first major event, a celebration of Chinese New Year."

Festival Disney is lobbying to extend the Hurricane technopop discotheque license until 5 A.M. in order to connect with the first Paris-bound RER at 5:30. What the (sorry, Walt) devil is going on here?

Back to Visual Basics: Cheap Art Books!

By Michael Lawton

COLOGNE — In 1983, Benedikt Taschen, then 22, received his first big lesson in business when he bought 40,000 copies of an American book about Magritte for $1 apiece. He sold them for around $3 each, within two months.

Today, at 31, Taschen has his headquarters in a mansion in Cologne, from which he sells worldwide one book every three seconds. There are fresh flowers in the office, an eclectic collection of sometimes pornographic art on the walls and a miniature Viking ship with tea chests ("Social Box Transporter" by Martin Kipperberger) hanging in the stairwell. The eccentric, slightly shocking image extends to the boss: Taschen projects an image of a naughty schoolboy trying to impress.

But his books are the important thing, and his record there is impressive. As he says, "It's more fun selling lots of them than selling a few." His books are mainly found piled in remainder outlets, and until recently, were sold wholesale in minimum orders of 1,000. Such economies of scale help keep prices down, but, in addition, projects are conceived so that every last penny can be squeezed out of them.

Taschen publishes two main series: the Basic Series (96 pages, 100 color illustrations, 14.95 Deutsche marks, or about $9), each volume features a single artist, photographer or designer; a more ambitious series at 29.95 DM (200 plus pages) deals with a wider theme such as the Bauhaus, or Contemporary Japanese Architecture.

BOOKS are translated in up to 20 languages, and the material may also turn up in the form of a poster, book, a postcard book, a calendar, and even as illustrations on the covers of notebooks. According to Taschen, he is now the only publisher producing nonsubsidized original art books in Germany today.

But the books are not produced down to their price. Texts are authoritative, illustrations are of high quality and the books are well designed. Taschen takes pride in the quality of his publications. He argues that, by bringing art books to people who previously could not afford them, he is educating the market that he has created. The reliability of his product means that readers who have enjoyed Taschen's books on Renoir or Expressionism are likely to trust themselves to buy his books on Egon Schiele or the Villars of Dresden.

The Taschen list has always included a fair amount of erotica — Taschen's eyes twinkle as he denies its importance in his marketing strategy. In addition to cheap and nasty books, such as that on the Italian porn star Cicciolina ("sold badly," says Taschen), there are more interesting topics such as the S&M pinup Betty Page, or the drawings of Tom of Finland, who, says Taschen enthusiastically, gave gays a positive image for the first time. Taschen is quick to spot a trend: Pierre et Gilles (of Mark Almond record covers fame) or the artist of the perpetual scream Gouffier Helwein (Norman Mailer is a fan) are both the subjects of recent books.

In 1990, on the centenary of van Gogh's death, Taschen put a monkey wrench in the works of many larger publishing houses by bringing out a two-volume edition of the artist's complete works which sold in Germany for 99.95 DM.

The success of the van Gogh has led to a new publishing line: two-volume standard texts with very generous illustrations. Taschen says that they want to produce a series — he calls them "our jumbos" — which no serious student can afford to be without, but at prices that make them universally available. The two-volume van Gogh is currently available in English in a smaller paperback format for $24.99. Picasso is available hardbound in the original size for $79.99, and Dali and Soutine are to follow.

■ It's good to know that there are people out there trying hard to make art, you know, more accessible and stuff. Britain's Opera North is enticing people into a production of Prokofiev's "The Love of the Three Oranges" by giving them scratch-and-sniff cards. "The whole point is to get rid of the very stuffy image of opera," a spokesman told the AP. Bayreuth, take note.

A Bronx Tale
Directed by Robert De Niro.
U.S. Robert De Niro stars off "A Bronx Tale" with the perfect sound, as if he were striking a tuning fork: the sweet harmonies of an a cappella doo-wop group, to accompany an image of the Bronx sky at twilight. This film, the first to be directed by one of the screen's most intuitive stars, instantly establishes a rueful, romantic view of its time and place. Beginning in 1960, and never venturing very far from East 187th Street, "A Bronx Tale" offers a warm, vibrant and sometimes troubling portrait of the community it describes. Almost everyone within that community sounds a little bit like Robert De Niro except for De Niro himself. That the film's large and varied group of actors should echo its director is hardly surprising: "A Bronx Tale" is about small-time mobsters, and De Niro has time and again set the standard for such characters. This is a showcase for Chazz Palminteri, who wrote the screenplay, first performed this material as a one-man show and now has the film's dominant role. Palminteri plays Sonny, the neighborhood mobster who is as much admired for his sleek personal style as for his absolute power. De Niro is able to lend toughness to an ending that risks becoming overpoweringly sentimental, and instead succeeds in conveying a strong sense of father-son love.

Malice
Directed by Harold Becker.
U.S. "Malice" could turn out to be the new season's pop mystery-suspense melodrama you won't want to miss. The film is deviously entertaining from its start through its finish, when most such movies go irretrievably to pieces. "Malice" stays the

THE GOOD SON
Directed by Joseph Ruben.
U.S. Combine Dennis the Menace with Hannibal Lecter and you'll have some idea of the character Macaulay Culkin plays in the marginally interesting new thriller "The Good Son." Henry is not a nice boy. His idea of fun is tossing a dummy off an overpass, causing a 10-car collision. For Henry, this is a trifling diversion, mere child's play. But to Mark (Elijah Wood), the 12-year-old boy who comes to stay with Henry's family on the coast of Maine while his father (David Morse) is away and who becomes Henry's unwitting accomplice, it is something else. "You're sick," he tells Henry. With the sometimes inspired director Joseph Ruben working from a script by the acclaimed British writer Ian McEwan, there was reason to believe the picture might offer more than a rounding-up of the usual suspects. But Ruben and company appear to have been completely content to approximate the standard excitement of the genre. The mere presence of the adorable baby star seems to throw the whole film out of whack, making the picture play more like an inadvertent comedy than a thriller. The real question is, where were the responsible adults when this thing was made?

Armani's Sea of Tranquillity
By Suzy Menkes
International Herald Tribune

MILAN — Giorgio Armani's show was a sea of tranquillity: water-pale pantsuits followed by a wave of soft dresses; a sudden ripple of fabric at the hips; a spray of chiffon as Armani's new pants opened at the sides; a mesh of shawl ending in fronds of fringe; a surface sparkling with embroidery, and swimsuits engulfed in tulle as though emerging from the ocean depths.

Under the surface of calm beauty and serenity surged an undercurrent of creativity. For this magnificent collection — received with an emotional ovation — was a rare fashion moment. It put into perspective not only a dull Milan season, but also the sea changes that are happening in fashion.

For Armani had changed everything and nothing. His statement is still for pantsuits and for a modern woman with freedom to move and a job to do. But the pants have broken free of their masculine image and emerged as a hybrid of pants and skirts — which were otherwise completely absent from the collection. Pants came in liquid fabrics with a sarong drape; there were soft jodhpurs narrowing at the ankle; or they were opened at the side seams to give the effect of a long skirt — but with freedom to stride. Gauzy or even lacy fabrics emphasized a pale prettiness.

Armani's signature mannish style had been redrawn on feminine lines. Vests, perhaps in openwork crochet, cupped a rounded bosom and were cut away to leave a bare back. Jackets became cardigans closed with a string at the waist or were transmuted into tunics. Dresses were tucked gracefully to the body before drifting into a long skirt. Jewelry was crafted from natural materials like shells or straw. And Armani even dallied with decoration.

Here was a designer, 58 years old and at the height of his powers, redefining how women want to dress at the end of the 20th century.

Armani's woman emerged with a graceful femininity, in her choice of limp, pale colors and light fabrics, some fine and liquid, other rough-woven, or printed with indefinable ethnic patterns veiled with a patina of age.

The show was also sumptuous. And Armani's embroideries, tracing gauzy fabrics with pinpoints of light, also redefined modern luxury. As the lights were extinguished on a lineup of winking, sparkling gowns, the braves began.

Among the ecstatic audience, Bergdorf Goodman's Ellen Seltzman, usually a succinct commentator, said, "I'm speechless."

Armani's swimsuit under tulle wrap.

There was a strong focus on knits — although this was a summer season show — with slithery viscose and rough ethnic natural weaves co-existing. In general, Milan seemed to be following the clean lines of American sportswear, which meant modern and wearable clothes that did not whiz fashion fast-forward.

The Paris collections start Friday. In a packed schedule, the big events are the official baptism of the new permanent fashion center in the Grand Louvre complex (although the Paris shows are still under canvas this season), and the jostling for a walk-out part in Robert Altman's "Ready-to-Wear" movie.

Sophia Loren, a guest at Armani's party, announced that Altman has summoned her for an audition: role so far unknown.

Fresh From the Sea, And Affordable Too

By Patricia Wells.
International Herald Tribune

PARIS — You can count on one hand the affordable fish restaurants in Paris, but now you can add two, and soon three, thoroughly respectable dining spots devoted to the treasures of the sea.

The first, L'Ostrade, is a totally bright and modern brasserie just steps from the Gare Montparnasse. The second is Vancouver, a smart, sparkling, business-like spot just off the Champs-Elysees. For the third, we will have to wait until June, when one of Paris's most historic and prestigious fish restaurants, Premier — closed since 1986 — reopens under the guidance of Jean-Claude Vrinat, the owner of Taillevent. At 16 Avenue Victor Hugo in the 16th arrondissement, La Maison Freres has been purchased by the Japanese firm Sogo Co., which has commissioned Vrinat to organize and direct the wildly ornate Art Deco monument. (For the impatient fish lover, the restaurant is currently open for private cocktail parties for 25 to 80, in the main floor dining room. For information and reservations, telephone 44.95.15.00.)

Diners looking for a reasonably priced fish and shellfish feast need look no further than L'Ostrade, where a whole Breton lobster, roasted to perfection, will cost no more than 120 francs (about $21). Those with even tighter pocketbooks can opt for the 75-franc tapas selection, five samplings that might include a brandade de morue, a carpaccio of salmon; a salad of potatoes and baby clams; tiny grilled roquet, and fried whitebait, or friture d'éperlan. Wash it down with a 48-franc pitcher of the sharp, light white Gros Plant and you're in business.

The restaurant is a huge, loftlike affair, all varnished blonde wood, cheery marine-blue tiles and white walls and a display of black-and-white photographs evoking the sea. Service is cheery, if a bit on the shaky side. (The service goes steadily downhill throughout the meal, as in many places where you're aware that they're running a business but not necessarily a restaurant.)

That said, if I could roast a whole Saint-Pierre as well as the cooks at L'Ostrade, I'd kick up my heels with delight. The sweet, white fish was crisp, yet perfectly moist, served with a top-rate potato purée and a welcoming green salad dressed with a whole-grain-mustard-flecked vinaigrette.

First courses might include a richly perfumed salad of dark green lentils and smoked salmon, and an assortment of oysters, including a dozen tiny bouchottes oysters (at only 50 francs) from the north Breton port of Paimpol, which produces some of the brightest, most saline oysters I have ever consumed.

The ambience is a bit more elegant and reserved at Vancouver, an 18-month-old restaurant that quickly captured a Michelin star for the owners, Jean-Louis and Chantal Decout. Their modern, honey-toned restaurant offers such sublime fare as fillet of bar grilled with its skin and served with a verdant parsley emulsion; sweet and sour shrimp paired with fresh seaweed, and a dim sum basket full of pillow-light langoustines wrapped in coriander leaf and served with fragrant basmati rice. The food is fresh, service efficient (if a bit timid) and there's a well-priced, 130-franc, 1991 Saint-Véran from Roger Luquet to top it all off.

L'Ostrade, 11 Boulevard de Vaugirard, Paris 15; Tel: 43.21.87.41. Open daily until 11 p.m. Credit cards: American Express, Visa, 75-franc tapas menu. A la carte, about 200 francs per person, including service but not wine.

Vancouver, 4 Rue Armand-Houssaye, Paris 8; Tel: 42.56.77.77. Closed Saturday and Sunday. Credit cards: American Express, Visa, 190-franc menu. A la carte, 250 to 300 francs, including service but not wine.

ROBERT, MY FATHER

By Sheridan Morley. 240 pages.
£16.99. Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

Reviewed by Joan Dupont

THERE was Simon Callow's biography of Charles Laughton, a study in suffering; Donald Spoto's book of revelations about Laurence Olivier, and the curtain keeps going up on private lives of great British actors. On the Broadway stage Lynn Redgrave's "Shakespeare for My Father" is an emotional evocation of a man who was all actor, casting a giant shadow over his family without really being there in the flesh. Consider then, the exceptional case of Robert Morley, a hale Father Christmas figure with his laughing eyes and wild brown hair, a towering personality who seemed to have been just as entertaining at home. Touring was his passion, yet he was married to the same woman for more than 50 years and had three children that he occasionally packed up and took along with him: they were part of his audience, they admired and applauded.

"If there was a thin, tormented or tortured man inside him trying to escape, he certainly did not make it," writes his son Sheridan Morley in this affectionate biography. "With Robert, what you saw was very often what you got, and my analysis of his inner self, either by him or by me, was hindered firstly by our somewhat clenched reticence, characteristic I think of both our generations, to examine ourselves too deeply for emotional or inherited scars."

Sheridan Morley, the IHT's theater critic in London and the author of biographies of Noel Coward, David Niven and James Mason, gives an enthusiastic review to a man who spent his life performing. And it's the performing animal you get: boisterous and funny, a fabulous raconteur. His darkest moments, it would appear, were caused not by inner demons, but by tax inspectors snapping at his growing income.

The Morleys' first-born arrived on the scene in December 1941, during his father's first night as Sheridan Whitehead in "The Man Who Came to Dinner" at the Savoy. Naming your son after a monstre sacré — the role was based on Alexander Woodcock — might have had a different effect on another child, but Sheridan enjoyed Robert's performances. Later in life, when he was a drama critic for The Times, he would slip into the theater in secret, and keep his impressions to himself.

After seeing him in Alan Bennett's "The Old Country" he noted that "it was dazzling and heartstopping, and I had never been so proud of him or impressed by him in my whole life."

A working actor-author, Robert Morley drove playwrights crazy by rewriting their scripts and ran roughshod over directors. A man of great bulk, he was often compared to Laughton and was offered many of the same parts, but tragedy was not what he loved first. He turned down "The Hunchback of Notre Dame," perhaps because there were more grunts than words to the part, played a slew of plump kings, including Louis XVI to Norma Shearer's Marie Antoinette on screen, but managed to live with a minimum of Shakespeare. He had a flair for discovering and importing French farces — "Hippopotamus" and "The Little Hut," adapted from André Roussin — to the London stage with resounding success. As a boy growing up in the '20s he had seen James Percy in Shaw's "The Doctor's Dilemma." "The magic of George Bernard Shaw transformed me from a fat, unlikable, bewildered young teenager into a potential leading man." Raised in an erratic fashion by a gambling father, the pudgy teenager auditioned for the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art with a monologue from "Don Juan," provoking a rude guffaw from Sir Gerald du Maurier, who reported on admiring him.

But Morley fell short of the intensity required at RAD and did not seem to have the stuff of a leading man. His first successes were in bedroom farces, which he took on the road; the touring bug was in him to the end of his long life. He dashed from continent to continent with such relish, he was such a physical actor — "the last of the great boulevardiers" — that he appeared, even to his son at times, not to take himself seriously enough.

There were other critics. Rex Harrison told him cuttly how simple his life was, with "one wife, one family, one home and, if I may say so, one performance." Yet he was able in his vast repertoire — 50 plays, 100 movies — to hit the bass notes. He showed his full range in the creation of "Oscar Wilde" on stage, and 24 years later, on screen, and as author and star of "Edward My Son," which he took to America, Australia and New Zealand.

If the flamboyant extrovert had frustrated desires, he did not go on record with them. A gambling man like his own father, he was addicted to the racetrack and managed money badly; he had little use for royal trappings and was one of the rare actors of his age to say no to knight-hood. His loyalty was to family — he had a privileged relationship with Gladys Cooper, his mother-in-law — his friends, and to his craft.

He died in 1992 at the age of 84, on Derby Day, which, his son points out, was one of the few he ever missed, and perhaps the only regret to which he would have admitted.

WHAT THEY'RE READING

● Jacques Fauriol, former editor-in-chief of Le Monde, is reading "La Russie en Guerre" ("Russia at War") by Alexander Werth and "La Guerre au Japon" by Robert Guillain.

"In today's context, we forget the terrible suffering of these two peoples, not to mention that of the German people. Man is a wolf towards man. But he endures more than an animal could bear."

PLAYERS taking part in a major team event at a national championship go into action at 1 P.M. and often play until after 1 A.M., with a break of about two hours for dinner. Some of them have more to do when play ends. Those who are members of the Appeals Committee may have to spend two hours or more considering thorny issues that have arisen at the table somewhere in the tournament.

One might think that staying up in the small hours would damage a player's performance the next day, but one Appeals Committee chairman did well in the Summer Nationals in Washington. Alan LeBending of Los Angeles reached the quarterfinal of the Spingold. On the diagrammed deal from the Spingold, LeBending held the South cards. West's three-spade bid was pre-emptive in the partnership style, and his four-spade bid was venture. The North player, Mike Tierney, might well have doubted this, but he persevered with five hearts and did even better.

A spade was led against five hearts doubled, and was won in the dummy. South saw two sure losers in the minor suits, and had problems in hearts and clubs. Since the missing aces were sure to be on his right, he led a diamond from dummy. This put East to the Morion's Fork test. If he played low, South would be able to win with the king, cross to the heart ace and throw the diamond on a spade winner.

In practice East grabbed the diamond ace, and South was able to maneuver two club discards, one on the diamond queen and one on a high spade. The heart queen was picked up with a finesse, and South scored 850. As cards lie, there were other ways for the declarer to succeed, but the immediate diamond lead was certainly the right plan.

AUSTRIA

At the Center of Change

POISED ON THE EXPANDING EDGE OF THE EUROPEAN MARKET

Austria has some cause for economic jubilation, but Austrians tend to be strangely pessimistic when evaluating their country's standing in the international community. What possible impact, they ask, can a small, landlocked country in the heart of Europe have on world affairs — poised between East and West, North and South, with plenty of musical power but no military might?

Even if they are reminded that Vienna has for the past 14 years been a major United Nations city and that important breakthroughs were made in the Hofburg Congress Center during the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, most Austrians will still shrug off any responsibility. The facade-cabs that laboriously ply their trade through the bustling downtown streets seem to suit their mentality more than the modern underground trains speeding along 40 kilometers of city track.

Then along comes a veteran American observer of the Central European scene, J.K. Galbraith, the 84-year-old economist. Addressing the Bruno Kreisky Forum for International Dialogue in March 1993, he said: "Austria's economic policy has been the most successful of all countries since the Second World War. It could be used as a pattern for the United States, especially the way in which market economy is related to the requirements raised by social problems to have escaped."

Instead, American enthusiasts for a pure market ideology took their doctrine from [conservative] Vienna masters — economists such as Hayek, Mises and Haberler — instruction which it was the great good fortune of Austria to have escaped.

In its mid-year Economic Outlook, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development offered more muted optimism: "Economic activity weakened in the second half of 1992 in response to a slump in exports. Inflation remained relatively high and unemployment crept up further... Austria's position as an outlier in the more general picture of European economic slowdown ended in late 1992. Falling orders created increasing problems of excess capacity in industry, compounded by heavy investment activity in recent years and an appreciation of the schilling... The progressive loss of export momentum in traditional markets was in part offset by the opening up of Eastern Europe, a good tourist season, better terms of trade and a slowing of import demand."

The OECD report concluded: "Near-term prospects for demand and output growth are heavily dependent on developments abroad. Facing sluggish export growth, notably to Germany, and with large margins of excess capacity, business investment is likely to fall in 1993 from previous high levels before picking up somewhat in 1994."

The fundamental question underlying all the economic scenarios is whether and when Austria will become a member of the European Community. At present, the country is a member of the European Free Trade Association, and it assumed the chairmanship of EFTA's Council of Ministers in July for the second half of 1993. Moves are being made to create the European Economic Area by the end of the year as a sort of halfway house to EC membership. An application for full membership was lodged in 1989, but it does not look like it will be realized before 1995 at the earliest.

"We want to become, and must become, a full member of the European Community," says Werner Teufelsbauer, director-general for economic policy at the Federal Economic Chamber. This, he adds, is part of a double challenge facing Austria, the other part being posed by the opening of Eastern Europe. The challenge is both economic and political, because if Austria does not succeed in gaining admission to the EC, the country will encounter massive discrimination in both fields.

The Federal Economic Chamber — a semi-governmental organization — predicts a new orientation of business in Central Europe. "We are witnessing a dramatic alteration," says Mr. Teufelsbauer. "It is as if we, in Austria,

THE CHANCELLOR'S VIEW OF EUROPE

On the eve of the Council of Europe conference in Vienna, the Austrian Federal Chancellor, Franz Vranitzky, spoke about major issues facing his country and the "new Europe."

How important for Austria is membership in the Council of Europe?

This membership is extremely important since the Council of Europe is one of the oldest established European institutions in which the Europeans took the first steps toward uniting their nations and bridging national differences. It amounted to the creation of an institution in which relevant questions of joint European interest were handled.

Would you like to see more of the reform states in Central and Eastern Europe as members?

Yes, I would like to see this if for no other reason than that membership in the Council of Europe presupposes certain democratic, legal and constitutional conditions, especially those relating to the protection of minorities. And the more member states that are qualified in this respect, the better it is for Europe.

When J.K. Galbraith was in Vienna this year to address the Bruno Kreisky

Foundation, he pleaded for much more assistance to the reform states of Eastern and Central Europe. Can Austria afford this and, if so, where do you draw the line? At Poland, Romania, Albania?

Galbraith, to my mind, pleaded absolutely correctly for more financial and economic cooperation between Eastern Europe and Western Europe. I think that my country and others have done a great deal on a bilateral plane as regards individual states. However, I also think we must go on and take further-reaching measures in order to offer structural development opportunities and assistance. Broadly speaking, I am referring to infrastructure investments of great magnitude, which necessitate a coordinated approach by large companies. This the European countries can only do in the form of an international association. With this in mind, I have launched an initiative

EUROPE 2000

A CONFLICT BETWEEN DIVERSITY AND UNITY

Whoever speaks of Europe today is usually referring to the European Community. The same can be said of the internal market, Maastricht or the projected political union. But what is Europe really? Basically, it is a collective term that is difficult to pin down due to the absence of any one defining characteristic. Any reference to Europe is a reference to disparate cultures, landscapes and traditions. Whoever wishes to speak of Europe must have a very good knowledge of each of these countries in order to know what is meant by the term. In fact, "Europe" comprises the 12 countries that constitute the EC, as well as the seven countries that have formed the European Free Trade Area, and those countries in the East that, until a few years ago, were contained behind the Iron Curtain.

Since the opening up of those Eastern European countries, the European Community, which is part of Europe, has entered a new phase. Not only the majority of EFTA countries, but also the new democracies in Eastern Europe are pressing strongly for integration with the EC. The efforts of the 12 EC countries to realize an internal market and to become politically effective as a single unit had, until then, been relatively smooth and predictable. However, as the situation stands now, the communal concept worked out for a dozen states has become so restricted that it fails to do justice to the new terms of reference.

FLEXIBLE CONCEPTS FOR A CHANGING COMMUNITY

The efforts of the Community to defuse the conflict between European diversity and indispensable unity have therefore run into a few problems. The path to a mutual Europe 2000 has to follow a path of political and economic dialectics, more centralism, where necessary, but also more independence. This is the only way of doing justice to the European character.

This has been a consistent aim of the EC. The Maastricht Treaty, for example, reflected the mutual experience of more than 40 years of such efforts. Nevertheless, political union is still something of a vision. Flexibility and determination are needed to achieve this union. The key elements of Maastricht are relevant to present and future Europe insofar as they strive for unity and emphasize diversity, since this combination also represents strength. Unity does not mean equality in the sense of everybody being the same. There will never be a European Community whose, let us say, 20 states will someday merge into one. Europe's strength lies in its dualism, but also in its rejection of narrow-minded nationalism and counterproductive protectionism. This strength lies in outward and inward openness, but also in unity where it is necessary.

AUSTRIA — FREEDOM THROUGH SECURITY

In this context, therefore, integration means linking states into this new concept of Europe and into its gradual realization. For Austria, Europe is no strange continent. It is the place where Austria has its roots. Austria's present efforts are a logical consequence of its own and of Europe's development. For Austria, this means integration and reinforcement, participation and growth; above all, this means more security and, with this, more freedom.

It was in 1989 that Austria began setting the parameters in this direction. Other EFTA states followed this direction, and as the Iron Curtain disappeared, Europe experienced a new lease on life. Austria is no longer in the position of wondering whether or not to participate in this integration process; instead, it must ask itself how it can best accelerate this process. The best guarantee for Austria's economic and political stability is without doubt as a part of this new European landscape.

DYNAMIC INTERACTION THROUGH INTEGRATION

Traditionally, Austria is a European country through and through. With its intimate knowledge of East and West, Austria can now reinforce and extend its role as mediator and facilitator. It is not only the geographic but also the psychological proximity to its Eastern neighbors that is increasingly attracting the attention of other countries, including those outside Europe. Its economic and political potential has considerably increased due to the opening up of the East and will be further highlighted with Austria's membership in the EC, making an integrated Austria very attractive. Austria will not only receive a boost but will also pass it on to others; it can take advantage of synergy as well as being itself a source of synergy. It will also continue to be an important and indispensable East-West mediator. Integration does not mean giving up one's identity. It is an interplay of forces that represents an enrichment for Europe and for Austria.

ADVERTISING SECTION

REGIONAL WINES WORTH A DETOUR

The best Austrian wines – and there are hundreds of them – are regarded by connoisseurs as a European specialty. There is only one drawback: although their numbers are large, their quantity is small. To be really enjoyed, they must be tasted on the spot.

The "freshness" of Austrian wines is a feature that endears them to the locals but means that, in general, they do not keep well. A mature Austrian wine will seldom be more than two or three years old. There are exceptions, of course, but it is rare to find older wines that are not already past their best.

"On the spot" drinking is necessary for other reasons. There is a culture of vinous understanding in the areas where the wines are made that does not seem to travel well, even within the boundaries of Austria. Serious imbibers should head for the eastern part of the country, where the vineyards are ranged in a semicircle along the borders with Moravia, Slovakia, Hungary and Slovenia. The provinces involved are Lower Austria ("Lower" relates to its position on the Danube), Vienna (at the hub of the semicircle), Burgenland and Styria.

The best season for sipping is probably autumn, and professionally conducted wine tours are available. Vino Veritas Austria is one of the names to look out for. Their tours are guided by connoisseurs dedicated to imparting the best knowledge available on the subject, with tastings all along the way.

As an alternative suggestion, if there is limited time on hand, the wine wisdom seeker could not do better than to stop over in the town of Krems on the Danube. Here a former Capuchin monastery, Kloster Und, has been completely rededicated to the miracles of the vinous spirit. No less than 110 of the choicest Austrian wines are on permanent display in well-appointed cellars covering 1,000 square meters. Good dining facilities in the former refectory round off the pleasure.

Krems is at the center of the riverside Wachau slopes, where the best vineyards (mainly for white wines) are on rocky terraces dating back to Roman times. The countryside is steeped in historical tradition: The first use of the present name Austria was recorded there in A.D. 996; parts of the Nibelung saga are associated with this stretch of the Danube; and King Richard the Lionhearted was once held hostage in the fortress at Dürnstein, the remains of which can still be seen.

Moving down the Danube, past the internationally renowned Wine Institute at Klosterneuburg, a more conventional wine-tasting scene awaits the visitor in Vienna, the capital, with its own tradition of the Heuriger, or wine tavern. Some sophistication has set in recently, often to the distaste of the locals: there is excellent public transport available to the former wine villages on the outskirts of the city – Grinzing, Sievering and Mauer, to mention only a few – making drinking in Vienna thoroughly convenient (especially for those who do not wish to drive after imbibing).

Farther down the arc, Burgenland finds favor with those who prefer sweeter vintages, including some dessert wines sold at princely prices. There are, however, also some fine reds to be had at reasonable prices (about 50 to 100 schillings, or $4.38 to $8.76 per bottle). Eisenstadt, the provincial capital, mounts an annual Festival of a Thousand Wines in September. Those with a more modest thirst might prefer to visit the ancient town of Rust, near Lake Neusiedl.

Austria's southernmost wine-growing district, in Styria, has such a small output that it is hardly "exported" even to the rest of the country. The selection is wide, however, and includes a unique variety called Schilcher, which looks like rosé but is not and that will guarantee one of the most exquisite experiences of a fact-finding Vino Veritas mission. D.H.

Once a Capuchin monastery, Klosterneuburg in the town of Krems is now dedicated to viticulture, with 110 of the choicest Austrian wines on permanent display.

Times change, the value of experience doesn't.

The pace of change in Central and Eastern Europe is producing new opportunities and new challenges. The most valuable asset Creditanstalt can offer for the future is our experience. Among western banks we are unmatched with our network and our links in these nascent markets.

This gives a familiarity which makes these countries almost a "home market" for us and our customers. Not least because our heavy involvement in this region is based on a long-standing tradition. For example, our presence in Budapest and Prague dates back to 1857. As new opportunities are emerging, no one is better placed to help you succeed.

Creditanstalt is today Austria's leading Financial Group with an international capability of commercial and investment banking, financial advisory, project and lease finance, new issues of equities and debt securities in Schillings and also other major convertible currencies, securities placing and trading, asset trading, and asset fund management and real estate counselling etc. through its extensive network in Europe, Argentina, Brazil, Hong Kong, Japan and the USA. The group has more than 10,000 employees.

As an universal bank the investment banking business has always played an important role in the Group's activities. In order to provide its corporate finance, merger and acquisition and privatisation activities a special impetus Creditanstalt established also investment banks in the Reforming Countries of Central Eastern Europe.

BANKS BECOME 'INVESTMENT-FRIENDLY'

The 1993 mid-year reports from Austrian banks aimed to defuse anxiety and give assurance about an imminent upswing in the business cycle, but there is no denying that the economic downturn has left its mark on all branches of the Austrian economy, including the banks.

The Austrian National Bank, the central issuing bank, has been a pillar of strength. It continues to pursue its hard-currency policy aimed at long-term stabilization of the exchange rate of the Austrian schilling. Notwithstanding a wave of speculation against the schilling in the wake of turbulence within the European Monetary System, the schilling's fixed 7:1 parity with the Japanese yen, Germany, the Netherlands, the United States and France. One of the results of this, as recorded by the GiroCredit Bank of Vienna, has been strong influxes of capital from abroad during the EMS crisis at the end of 1992, which enabled the Austrian money market to continue to enjoy a high degree of liquidity during the first half of 1993.

GiroCredit, with total assets of 329 billion schillings ($29 billion), acts as a clearing center for some 80 savings banks throughout Austria. It has recently been engaged in important financing projects in Central Europe, including the organization of funding for the purchase of the Budapest Hotel Duna Inter-Continental by the Marriott Corporation. Hans Haumer, chairman of GiroCredit, praises the bank's skill in "financial engineering," which enabled this deal to be pulled off in the face of keen international competition.

There is consensus in Austria that the country is overbanked and overstaffed. This applies in particular to Bank Austria, for reasons beyond its control. This institution was formed in 1991 by the merger of the former Zentralbank and the Österreichische Länderbank, thus creating the largest single banking body in the country, with total assets of 563 billion schillings.

Deutsche mark remained unaltered. Interest rates have also been cut consistently in line with those in Germany, so that the Austrian National Bank governor, Maria Schaumayer, was able in September to commend the "investment-friendly interest level" prevailing in Austria, the lowest since 1989.

On an international level, Austria has a good reputation for its credit-worthiness. According to the respected Institutional Investor magazine, it ranks in seventh place worldwide, behind Switzerland, of them within stone-throwing distance of each other). The problem remains of what to do about two massive head offices functioning with partly incompatible electronic data-processing systems. Optical fiber links have been installed between the two headquarters, but software cannot be easily adjusted, it seems.

On an international plane, Bank Austria's strategy is to concentrate on three main financial centers: London, New York and Hong Kong. Gerhard Randa, deputy chairman, says the emphasis will remain on "traditional strengths, such as retail banking, corporate banking (especially export and project finance), investment banking and treasury operations. Bank Austria has been operating in Moscow since the beginning of 1993, facilitating close cooperation with Austrian exporters. There are promising indications of the potential of the Moscow branch to attract business from Western countries.

Moscow branch helps investors

A second major strategic move of Bank Austria concerns the consolidation of the Austrian savings-bank sector. Bank Austria is pushing for reorganization of the shareholder structure of GiroCredit. The main shareholders - Bank Austria and Die Erste (First Austrian) - together hold more than 50 percent of the shares of GiroCredit, and a solution is thought to be near at hand.

The previous leader on the Austrian banking scene, Creditanstalt (with current assets of 552 billion schillings), also felt the pinch during the 1992 economic difficulties and their aftermath. As Creditanstalt's chairman, Guido

Schmidt-Chiari, explains, his policy is to apply perseverance and flexibility to uphold his institution's claim to be a leading independent commercial bank in Central Europe.

Since the end of the Cold War, the bank has adopted a two-pronged campaign in the reform states of Eastern Europe, building up both its commercial banking activities and its investment banking arm. Experience shows that U.S. and British customers are pleased to be able to call on Creditanstalt know-how in their dealings with Hungary, Poland, Slovenia and the Czech Republic (in each of whose capitals Creditanstalt has a branch). "Markets in the West are largely saturated, whereas many in Central and Eastern Europe are wide open," says Mr. Schmidt-Chiari.

Foreign activities are seen as one way of offsetting difficult market conditions at home, where serious concern is felt about the large, and growing, number of insolvencies. A cost-cutting program has been introduced that included a 3 percent reduction in personnel during the first half of this year. The result has been that operating profit is "very satisfactory." Creditanstalt has captured 11 percent of domestic over-the-counter business with only 4 percent of nationwide branch offices of all banks.

As far as the once considerable industrial shareholdings are concerned, Creditanstalt has quietly off-loaded about half of the original stock over the past few years. Among the important remnants are: Steyr-Daimler-Puch, which has been experiencing some difficulties in the automotive sector but is still exceptionally strong in the field of innovations; and Wienerberger AG, whose bricks and tiles and other conventional building components are still proving a runaway success.

Much the same pattern of caution and economy has characterized recent moves by First Austrian (total assets: 185 billion schillings), which acquired Aktiengesellschaft (joint stock company) status in June. Its chairman, Konrad Fuchs, who has his finger on the pulse of small and medium-sized Austrian businesses, believes that only through more investment can the threat of cheap-labor countries be countered. The bank's own staff has been reduced this year by 1.5 percent, while efficiency has been improved by the development and application of a revolutionary electronic storage and retrieval system for 700,000 customer signatures. It is the only European bank with this facility.

Renowned for its taut structure and reluctance to take risks, the 100-year-old Bank Winter is Austria's largest private bank (total assets: around 29 billion schillings) and is rated by a leading German financial institution as one of the top privately controlled banks in Europe. Operating from its head office in Vienna, the bank engages mainly in extensive trade financing in Austria and internationally. In the latter field, the bank has traditionally held a prominent position in Eastern Europe.

"We have always been very short-term minded, and still are," says the director Thomas Moskovics, who took over the reins last month after the death of his father, Simon Moskovics. A study a few years ago by a prime merchant bank in London concluded that the average maturity of the total balance sheet assets of Bank Winter was 161 days. Mr. Moskovics says that the maturity period may now have shortened further.

At present, Bank Winter's main area of policy in the international field is to assist its customers in adapting to rapidly changing conditions in Eastern Europe and to ensure that their business continues to grow. The bank also intends to extend investment private banking services to its many contacts and customers in Central and Eastern Europe. D.H.

AIRPORT GIRDS UP FOR MORE TRAFFIC IN NEW EUROPE

The opening up of Eastern Europe has had a major impact on airline traffic in the whole of Central Europe. Vienna International Airport was prepared from the outset to cope with the demands arising from its position at the heart of the new Europe.

Since 1989, passenger-handling capacity has more than doubled at Vienna International Airport. Last year saw completion of a spacious new check-in terminal with 50 check-in counters and ancillary facilities, and work has since started on the renovation and conversion of the old departure terminal.

The need for this expansion is demonstrated by the latest statistics and forecasts. In 1973, around 2 million passengers used Vienna airport (or Schwechat, as it was then known, named after the town in Lower Austria where it is situated). By 1989, the 3 million annual mark had been topped, and in 1989, the total was 5 million. Last year's figure of 6.8 million is expected to nearly double by the year 2000, to reach 20 million in 2010.

Private investors offered shares

This favored position in the civil aviation sector necessitates a total investment cost of 8 billion Austrian schillings ($701 million) between 1990 and 1996. Since this sum would be impossible to finance through cash-flow alone, private investors were last year asked to inject equity into the company. In June 1992, 5.4 million shares were issued; within a few hours, they were far oversubscribed. As the directors of the new public limited company, Gerhard Kastelic and Franz Kotrba of Flughafen Wien AG, said in their 1992 annual report:

"The move to go public [was made] at a time when the overall circumstances were quite mixed: Stock market trading in general, and more specifically the Vienna stock exchange, fell substantially short of expectations. We were nonetheless able to prove that a healthy, solid company can perform extremely well even in a poor market climate."

Responsibility is accepted by the Vienna Airport company for the planning, construction, maintenance and operation of all Vienna airport facilities. Most of the revenue (75 percent) is generated by airline customer services, with the rest being derived from non-aviation passenger facilities. The present total surface area occupied by the airport company is over 10 square kilometers, but sufficient adjoining land has been bought to accommodate all foreseeable expansions, such as hangars.

Of the two existing runways (estimated to be sufficient until 2010) one was given a general overhaul earlier this year. Apron space allows for 58 aircraft parking positions, of which eight allow direct access to the terminal from the aircraft.

Emphasis in planning has been laid throughout on passenger-friendly service. No great distances ever to be traversed, and Vienna Airport guarantees that passengers and their luggage will be checked in smoothly up until 30 minutes before departure. Among pilots, Vienna enjoys a good reputation as a "fast" airport, always doing its best to reduce the ground time of aircraft to a minimum. The average runway access time is a mere three minutes.

All these features are being used to best advantage in the airport's current marketing strategy, which aims to attract more airline business to and from Eastern Europe and the Far East. Situated at the center of a 14 million person catchment area, this airport is becoming increasingly attractive for Asian airlines connecting with Europe, especially since redistribution to other destinations is smooth and safe.

Vienna's "Airport of the New Europe" - as it likes to sell itself - may soon be linked with the airport at Bratislava, the capital of Slovakia, which is less than 40 kilometers away. Plans have been put forward by Flughafen Wien AG for an "airport system" in which the Bratislava branch of the operation, whose passenger services have declined over the past few years, would concentrate mainly on charter-cargo services, thus taking some of the pressure off Vienna.

Bratislava would stand to benefit from an injection of 200 million schillings in capital, plus sorely needed modern technological know-how, while also gaining direct access to a Western market. A major problem is that only a single international road crossing-point connects Austria and Slovakia. This is hopelessly inadequate for the vastly increased amount of car and truck traffic, and regular delays of over an hour for communication between the airports have to be faced. D.H.

BUSINESS BRIEFS

Alcatel Austria, part of the international Alcatel Alsthom communications group, provides an illustration of the advantages of plowing back earnings into R&D. The planning and construction of interlocking railway signaling systems has been a major Alcatel Austria success story in the 1990s. The buzzword at Alcatel now is IVR (Interactive Voice Response) whereby a business, hotel or official department, thanks to ingenious software, can turn a simple telephone into a complete round-the-clock customer/company interface.

In Styria, Austria Mikro Systems International has developed a silicon chip that, although smaller than a fingernail, contains the entire electronics required by an advanced telephone (except for some functions in the receiver). The chip, the first of its kind in the world, is also remarkable for its minute power consumption and low price.

Biopac Biologische Verpackungs-systeme of Leobendorf, Lower Austria, has developed a biological packaging material made of a natural raw material of which there is a worldwide surplus: industrial starch. Since it constitutes biogenic refuse, the packaging can be composted.

The Austrian branch of Solvay, located in Salzburg, is spearheading a project with 10 neighboring communities for recovering PVC waste, using liquid cyclones to sort plastics by their specific weight. The PVC can be re-used for products of progressively lower sophistication. The plastic screw-tops of mineral-water bottles, for example, are collected and turned into cable-covering plates protecting underground telephone cables.

Austria's oldest coffee merchant and grocery store group, Julius Meinl, which had branches all over the former Austro-Hungarian Empire, is moving back into Eastern Europe, starting with Hungary. It will operate under the name of Csemege, a now privatized company that has a network of more than 120 stores, usually 50 of which are in Budapest. Expansion into the Czech Republic and Slovakia is planned.

among the four countries that count, more or less, as front-line states with the reform states - Finland, Germany, Austria and Italy. And during the late autumn and winter of this year, we will try to set up the right structural framework.

I do not want to make any discrimination between the individual countries, but the division arises automatically, because several countries are more advanced with their infrastructural projects and relevant ad-ministrations than others.

Realization of the European Economic Area is taking much longer than was originally foreseen. Are you still in favor of Austria participating, even though Switzerland has opted out?

As far as the time factor is concerned, there is a realistic chance that all the ratification procedures for the EEA will be completed by the end of the year. And it will come into force at the beginning of 1994. It is an interim stage, but important because it enables a high degree of participation in European integration. The fact that Switzerland is not going along with the idea

'All of us in Central Europe have an obligation to ensure that nationalist and ethnic discrepancies are not allowed to escalate.'

does not weaken it, and we and the other EFTA countries think we should nevertheless realize the EEA.

What is your ideal time scale for Austria's accession to the European Community?

The European Community itself has fixed Jan. 1, 1995 as a possible and desirable date on which Austria and the other EFTA countries that are seeking membership should be admitted. I have always said that we take cognizance of this date as a stimulant to bring more tempo into our negotiations. And I'll stick with that. If for any reason whatsoever this date proves impossible, then we will accept another date without any difficulty.

At a bank symposium recently, you went on record as regretting that Austria was well known abroad for the music of Haydn, Mozart and Strauss but too little for its technological achievements. What is being done to correct this imbalance?

Both state institutions and private entrepreneurs have moved to create a better profile as regards research and development. We intend to give our universities more autonomy and greater opportunities to engage in applied research. Furthermore, we have taken a number of tax measures, coming into effect on Jan. 1, 1994, to considerably improve Austria's economic standing. So I think that everything connected with know-how and high-tech will improve considerably in the near future. What I hope is that it will turn out to be a melodious Gesamtsinfonie harmonizing R&D with Haydn and Schubert and Mozart.

In conclusion, would you summarize Austria's feelings toward its neighboring countries in what we used to call "Eastern Europe" and now refer to more appropriately as "Central Europe" - particularly with respect to human rights?

Obviously the best links are with our immediate neighbors - because of the geographical proximity but also because of historical and cultural relationships, as well as often a direct family relationship. This applies, for instance, to Slovenia, Slovakia, Hungary, the Czech Republic and, to a certain extent, Poland. And it also applies to Ukraine, Belarus and a few Central Asian republics.

As regards human rights, in international relations we have no problems with any of those states I have just mentioned.

All of us in Central Europe have an obligation, however, to ensure that nationalist and ethnic discrepancies, which are always observable in this multinational throng we call Europe, are not allowed to escalate.

My answer is that we need binding international legal frameworks that make it possible for the international community to intervene in certain circumstances.

And, still more important, we must do everything through economic cooperation to create an economic basis that instills a greater desire for an improved living standard than for the settlement of nationalistic conflicts. That, in a nutshell, is far and away the most important task for the remaining '90s here in Central-Eastern Europe.

AUSTRIA

How TOURISM CAN PROTECT THE VILLAGES AND FARMS

To counter environmental damage caused by tourism, the Austrian National Tourist Office has embarked on "Sanfter Tourismus," or soft tourism, a program to promote environmental care and quality.

As one of the world's main tourist destinations, Austria has become increasingly concerned with the ecological effects of tourism. Annual tourist arrivals of over 25 million have brought a growth in air pollution from automobile exhaust, noise pollution and soil erosion throughout the country.

The goal of the Sanfter Tourismus program is to uphold Austria's high tourism standards while protecting its natural resources as well as its population's quality of life. At the same time, the program aims to be economically beneficial to a country whose tourist industry generates nearly 115 billion Austrian schillings ($10.4 billion) annually in foreign currency revenue.

Traffic banned from some centers

Two projects of the National Tourist Office are called "Village Holidays in Austria" and "Holidays on the Farm," both of which offer visitors back-to-nature vacations in areas or regions off the beaten track. Both are oriented toward environmental protection.

The Village Holidays program comprises 21 villages throughout Austria selected as ideal models of "natural living." They were chosen by an independent advisory board from the ministries of environment, agriculture and economic affairs and the National Tourist Office.

Visitors to these villages, located mostly in the provinces of Carinthia and Styria, are provided with the cleanest possible surroundings, as judged by the board. The visitors themselves are encouraged to abide by the guidelines that local residents follow, such as separating trash for recycling.

The advisory board applied rigorous criteria to the 180 villages that applied to participate in the Village Holidays project; the 21 chosen had passed the board's tough scrutiny in three main areas: character, ecological activities and social/tourism activities.

For example, in terms of character, village centers scored by having generous amounts of greenery and flowers. The proximity and convenience of churches, fountains, restaurants and shopping facilities were noted.

Among the ecological factors judged, clean drinking water was rated first. The sparing use of fertilizers impressed the judges, and highways had to be located a minimum of 3 kilometers away from the village. The number of automobiles passing through each village daily had to be less than 4,000. Also, area industrial plants were judged on the amount of noise and air pollutants they emitted.

None of the villages chosen have more than 3,000 inhabitants. Only 25 percent of the houses in each village can lodge guests.

Just as important as the environmental condition of the villages and their surroundings is the ruling that residents must show an interest in tourism as well as environmental activities.

According to the Austrian National Tourist Office, the majority of the guests in these villages, mostly Germans and Austrians, had actively sought out soft tourism vacations.

"The typical guests are environmentally aware," says Christa Lausenhammer, press representative for the National Tourist Office. "They take hikes, swim, don't drive so often and separate their garbage for recycling."

The same is generally true for those taking Holidays on the Farm. Although the farmhouses did not have to meet strict advisory board requirements, their purpose is also to offer visitors a stay in natural surroundings, with clean air, fresh food and contact with local people. The aim is to provide contact with the earth without harming it.

There are 28,000 farms in Austria providing vaca-suddenly have Hong Kong just outside our door." He points out that wage levels in neighboring Hungary and Slovakia are only approximately one-tenth of those in Austria.

According to Federal Economic Chamber thinking, the strategy for Austria must be to quit labor-intensive areas and move to the upper end of the market as far as quality and innovation are concerned, and to invest heavily in the reform states of Eastern Europe, where Austria is already engaged in 10,000 joint ventures. This position is firmly supported by Lorenz Fritz, vice president of the Association of Austrian Industrialists, who has called on those with political responsibility to promote the internationalization of the Austrian economy (large-scale industry, in particular).

This must be a two-way process. The OECD, in its recent survey, commends the free-trade agreements being concluded with Eastern trading partners and concludes: "The government's intention to finance improvement of roads linking Austria to the East, and its highly successful training programs for bankers and business managers from nations of the former Soviet Union ... serve to build up the infrastructure for stronger trade and investment links, and to extend hope and build goodwill."

One remarkable initiative deserves to be highlighted in this connection. The Joint Vienna Institute, set up last year as a cooperative venture between the Austrian National Bank, the International Monetary Fund and three other international organizations, is successfully training officials and private-sector managers from IMF member states in Central and Eastern Europe, as well as the former Soviet Union and Asia. The Vienna Business Promotion Fund supports investors interested in establishing themselves in the capital and facilitates this process.

Since it was founded in 1982, the fund has helped about 550 enterprises to settle in Vienna. It has earned international headlines for its Innovation Scheme, which has, for instance, backed the development of a Braille notebook PC and a color-recognition system for the blind.

Balance of Power Shifts
With Bulls' Loss of Jordan

By Clifton Brown

New York Times Service

NEW YORK — Michael Jordan's sudden retirement has made the New York Knicks the preseason favorite to win the National Basketball Association's Eastern Conference title, but it also enhances other teams' chances to dethrone the Chicago Bulls as conference champion.

Jordan's announcement shifts the balance of power in the East like the retirement of no other player could. Cleveland, which has lost in the playoffs to Chicago the last two years, and Charlotte, considered the fastest-rising team in the league, could contend with the Knicks and Chicago for the title. Other teams, like the Orlando Magic, could see their fortunes improve as a result of Jordan's absence.

But it is the Knicks who will bear the most expectations of replacing the Bulls at the top. The Knicks had the best record (60-22) in the conference last season. They took the Bulls to six games in the conference playoff final. They return the same nucleus from last season's team. And the Bulls, although they have added Toni Kukoc, have lost basketball's best player.

So the road to a championship, where the Knicks hope they are headed, appears easier. But Ernie Grunfeld, the Knicks' assistant general manager, stressed Wednesday that it would be a mistake for the Knicks to feel they have a pass to the finals.

"Nobody's going to be handing any championship trophies to us," he said, as the team prepared to open training camp Friday in Charleston, South Carolina. "Whatever we get, we'll have to earn."

There are a lot of good teams in this league. Even before this happened, there were four or five teams that strongly believed they could win a championship, and we're still one of those four or five teams."

Still, Grunfeld admitted that Jordan's retirement would have an impact on the division.

"There's no way I'm going to say that the Bulls, after losing perhaps the greatest player who ever played, still have the team they once did," he said. "Time will tell how they adjust. I'm sure Kukoc will have to play more right away than they probably wanted. But I still think they'll be a formidable team."

The Bulls, however, no longer appear as formidable as the Knicks on paper. Of course, the Knicks' expectations, already high, will increase even more. Anything less than reaching the NBA final will be viewed by some as a disappointment.

Magic Enrich Hardaway

After the hardaway, the flashy point guard whose basketball skills have been likened to those of Magic Johnson, agreed to a multi-year contract worth $65 million that he was to sign Thursday with the Orlando Magic. The Associated Press reported.

The NBA team was so impressed with the All-American from Memphis State that it traded Chris Webber, the No. 1 pick in June's draft, to the Golden State Warriors for Hardaway and three future draft choices.

The contract would be the second highest in pro team sports behind the 12-year, $84 million deal signed Tuesday by Larry Johnson of the Charlotte Hornets.

Webber was reported to be in good condition Thursday after what his doctor called a routine appendectomy.

Webber was recovering at Henry Ford Hospital in his native Detroit, where he underwent the 40-minute procedure Wednesday evening.

He went to the hospital Tuesday night after complaining of stomach pains and was admitted following a series of tests.

Webber was expected to be released by Friday, said Dr. Ray Chung, who performed the appendectomy. Chung said Webber could expect to resume normal activities in 2-4 weeks.

Webber had planned to join the Warriors in time for the opening of training camp Friday, although he hasn't yet signed with the team.

Credibility Lost

International Herald Tribune

PARIS — Every time Michael Jordan took off, it seems now, his sport rose a bit higher. The challenge facing the National Basketball Association, following Jordan's decision to quit, is to keep the game's popularity from retreating with him.

For the first time in 14 years, the NBA next month begins a season without a credible star. It was a dead league, don't forget, until Magic Johnson and Larry Bird founded their superstar club. To get in you needed one of those NBA championship rings. In 1983, Julius Erving was admitted, finally and long past his time, but rules are rules. Isiah Thomas didn't give up until he'd fought his way in, and Jordan — remember? — was not taken seriously until he'd won membership with the first of his three league titles in 1991. Until then he was dismissed as a mere scorer.

Only Thomas is still playing, but he's finished winning championships. How far are the standards going to fall? Already new stars are being promoted, as a matter of supply and demand, long before they've earned it.

Charles Barkley is the biggest name out there, but he hasn't won anything beyond last summer's pre-ordained New York Knicks championship rings. ITF Bans Agassi for 1 Davis Cup Match

The Associated Press

LONDON — Andre Agassi was barred Thursday from playing for the United States in its next Davis Cup match as punishment for pulling out of his final singles match against the Bahamas last month.

The International Tennis Federation also fined the U.S. Tennis Association $1,500 for Agassi's withdrawal on the final day of the United States' 5-0 sweep in Charlotte, North Carolina.

In pulling out of his match, Agassi questioned why the last two matches had to be played since the U.S. team had already clinched its victory. His place was taken by Richey Reneberg.

The ITF noted that Agassi's withdrawal was made without the approval of the referee, in violation of Davis Cup rules. The one-match suspension and fine are automatic punishments.

By defeating the Bahamas, the U.S. team qualified for next year's World Cup. Agassi will not be eligible for the first-round match on March 25-27.

New York's Energy

By Russell Baker

NEW YORK — I like New York in fall. How about you? Set to a Gershwin tune, the words are running through my mind as the car plunges wildly up Hudson Street.

I love driving up Hudson Street. It's urban rodeo. An immense asphalt wave hits the front end. Only the seat belt keeps me from flying through the roof.

"Energy! It's that New York energy!" I exult to my wife, who is cringing in the passenger seat. "Only in New York do you feel energy like this."

She observes that this massive street rehabilitation project may be in the hands of a 7-year-old boy since absolutely no progress has been made on it since last we experienced the immense Hudson Street energy five months ago. Why, she asks, if the famous New York energy is so intense, does Hudson Street lie eternally in a state of utter torpor?

I hate torpor, especially when I have driven all the way from Burgville for refreshing drafts of the famous New York energy. "Don't be low-key. Feel the energy," I urge her.

There is a thrillingly energizing confrontation as we attempt a left turn into Third Avenue at 23rd Street. Do I dare try for the turn in the face of the challenging roar from the oncoming car that clearly has the right of way and is clearly determined to claim it, though it cost us both a life and perhaps a few pedestrians' toes?

I do dare. This is New York. I am charged with energy. We miss colliding by a fractionated millimeter. I race full-gallop to catch the next traffic light on the yellow, arrive an instant too late and, crying "This is New York!" to my whimpering wife, shoot through on the red.

Our hotel awaits with its incredible array of hotel taxes that will add some 24 percent to the bill as we are asked to leave. No, says the desk clerk, no new hotel taxes have been added within the past week by either city or state.

"Never fear," I comfort him. "Surely they are only temporarily out of energy. Soon they will take an energizing drive up Hudson Street and give us a new 3 or 4 percent hotel tax."

My wife is not cheered. She thinks they might use a little of the present 24-percent tax to do a little work on Hudson Street.

"It's autumn in New York," I tell her. "Feel the energy, and off we go to look at famous people. Other people all over the United States have driven to the sticks to look at leaves. We have driven to New York to look at the energy of famous people."

I use the residue of my Hudson Street energy to finagle an invitation to a book-publishing party. It is for Frank Conroy, head of the Iowa Writers Workshop, who has just published a new novel titled "Body and Soul," and since the book is about a musical genius the party is at Carnegie Hall.

En route, thinking to give a New Yorker the joy of telling a hick "Practice, practice, practice," I ask an energetic-looking man how to get to Carnegie Hall. "Better take a taxi," he says, the witless clod.

We do, completing the mile-and-a-half journey in 33 minutes (slightly better than one and a half miles per hour, thanks to the immense energy that has cars, trucks and buses gridlocked at every intersection).

The energy at the reception is intense. Author Conroy is beset by urgently energetic demands for handshakes from people brimming with energy as well as the need to get to the next place, or, in many cases, to find out where the next place is.

Autumn in New York! I love it! And what is New York, or autumn either, without the theater? Two $50 bills produce a surge of office energy at a Broadway theater sufficient to provide two seats for Lynn Redgrave's performance in "Shakespeare for My Father."

What energy she has! What a lovely evening! And what an energy test for the audience has been contrived by the seat designer. He — surely not a she — has made the seats so narrow that there is no space on either side for shoulders and arms.

All through the show I contest vigorously but silently for arm room, losing a closely fought bout with a big man on my left, but whipping my wife hands down — no, make it elbows down.

What a town! What energy!

Literary Ice: Peter Hoeg's Sense of Snow

By Sarah Lyall
New York Times Service

NEW YORK — Denmark's most successful author since Isak Dinesen is a 36-year-old former ballet dancer named Peter Hoeg who owns no television set, telephone or car and whose idea of a bad time is having to appear in public.

"It's not like I'm a pop star or an actor having to be in the limelight all the time," said Hoeg, who traveled to New York recently to help promote "Smilla's Sense of Snow," the first of his four books of fiction to be translated into English. "I've been in obscurity for the past two years, and I will return to obscurity again."

Hoeg, who has an otherworldly calm and a way of keeping still for a long time before speaking, is now back home, outside Copenhagen. But his novel, part thriller, part morality tale, is establishing a rare presence in the United States for a translated work by an unknown foreign author. With careful nurturing by its U.S. publisher, Farrar, Straus & Giroux, "Smilla," a best-seller for a year in Denmark that has been translated into 17 languages, is beginning to percolate at the bottom of many national best-seller lists.

A warm critical reception and enthusiastic word of mouth are certainly helping. Critics love "Smilla," which tells of a fierce and independent woman, an elegant 37-year-old expert on snow and ice who has never mastered the subtleties of human relationships. She investigates the death of an Eskimo boy from Greenland named Isak, who lived in her apartment building in Copenhagen and appears simply to have fallen from a roof.

But Smilla knows that Isak was morbidly afraid of heights, and she thinks it odd that the Danish authorities seem so concerned with his death. When she looks at his tracks in the snow and sees that he ran off the roof at full tilt, she is convinced that there is something going on.

And there is: Smilla's unorthodox investigation takes her into the archives of one of Denmark's largest corporations, introduces her to a slew of characters even odder than she is, and finally sends her on a mysterious ocean trip to what seems the end of the world in Greenland.

But Smilla is so fully and interestingly drawn that the book's plot almost becomes beside the point, embedded as it is in a thicker of her musings about Freud's "Elements," the nature of glaciers, the physics of drowning and how heritage shapes destiny.

"The true pitch, rather than the book's penchant for adventure, is what keeps the reader riveted," wrote Fernanda Eberstadt in The New Yorker. She and other critics have been particularly struck by the author's discussion of the racial and cultural barriers separating the world of Smilla's dead mother, an Eskimo who hunted as fearlessly as a man, and her father, a cool Danish anesthetist trapped by his own rationality.

Hoeg, who said the idea for "Smilla" came to him in two evocative and wrenching dreams about Greenland, wrote the book from Smilla's point of view. "Longing for a woman is one of the strongest moving forces in the life of a man, so maybe this was an attempt to get closer to a woman, to explore the landscape of a woman."

His journeys to the Caribbean, to Cuba and to Africa (where he and his wife, a dancer from Kenya, spend months at a time at home with her tribe) helped him understand his heroine. "One of the things I most admire outside Western society is the strength of the women I've seen in Third- and Fourth-World countries. In many ways, Smilla is as much a tropical creation as an Eskimo."

Hoeg has worked as a dancer, an actor, a drama teacher and a sailor, among other things, and he brings the same discipline to his writing that he brought to his previous jobs.

He has an intense aversion to many of the things on which most novelists thrive, like fame and hand-holding from editors. He works uninterruptedly each day, but then puts his work behind to devote himself completely to his wife and daughter. "Public life is a huge vacuum cleaner, and it can suck you out," he said. "Books grow out of calmness and balance and quiet; they don't come from turbulence."

As part of his effort to stave off turbulence, Hoeg refuses to accept advances. ("Writing is closely related to liberty, and if I was accepting money in advance, I would lose that," he said.) As another part of that effort, he refuses to discuss his books until they are finished. His Danish publisher never knows when she might expect the next Hoeg manuscript. The author tends to show up unexpectedly on his bicycle and present it.

After 10 years of full-time writing, Hoeg has published four books: "Smilla," the third, is not only the first one to be translated into English, it is also the only one. His latest novel, a study of children and their relationship to time whose title, roughly translated, is "The Marginal Cases," has just come out in Denmark and is to be published in the United States by Farrar, Straus within a year or so. "It's a question of energy, keeping a wave of energy rolling for two years, in this case," Hoeg said by way of explaining his long periods of mental isolation. "Books are created in a state of inner equilibrium. I feel when a book has been published, I lose it completely; it becomes lost in a mist of other people's opinions. I feel that I have lost Smilla completely now."

The book is to be made into a film by the director Bille August, Hoeg said. Although he plans to be involved in the adaptation, he did not say whether he would tighten the book's ambiguous ending, which left some readers frustrated and wondering how all the pieces fit together.

But he insisted that he meant it that way. "There is no clear solution, in my opinion, to the questions raised in the novel," he said. "I want to involve the readers in the awareness that there are ambiguities, even as you respect the rules. It is like chemistry: The details shall all have a logical explanation, but it is the overall problems, the principal questions, that are left unanswered."

Movie biggies from Hollywood to Hong Kong turned up at the opening of China's first international film festival in Shanghai on Thursday. The American director Oliver Stone, whose movies have yet to reach China's cinema screens, was mobbed by autograph-seekers at the Shanghai Art Film Center. Stone is on the jury along with Nagisa Oshima of Japan, Tsui Hark of Hong Kong, and Xie Jin of China.

John Backus, the inventor of Fortran, the first general-purpose, high-level computer programming language, has won the $375,000 Charles Stark Draper Prize, the largest award in engineering. The prize will be presented by the National Academy of Engineering at a ceremony in February in Washington. Fortran had its genesis in a memo written by Backus in 1953. It was developed by him and a team of researchers to be as translator between the human user and the computer brain.

William Shatner, Captain Kirk of "Star Trek," has been chosen grand marshal of the 195th Tournament of Roses in Pasadena, California. The theme of the New Year's Day parade is "A Fantastic Adventure," but Shatner will not be heading up to a floral version of the Enterprise. He will ride his own Kentucky-bred horse, I Prefer Roses.

Natalia Makarova picked a solo choreographed almost 90 years ago for her first foray into modern dance. Makarova, retired from classical ballet, performed at the opening of the Martha Graham Dance Company's season in New York. She danced "The Incense," choreographed in 1906 by Ruth St. Denis.

Protests by black activists against the Toronto production of the Jerome Kern musical "Show Boat" have fizzled, and the show earned thumbs up from the preview audience. Garth Drabinsky, the producer, said, "Show Boat" has never been a racist show, never was and never will be, "adding the show has an anti-racist message."

"I wonder if the little guy had fun today?"

Sharing the day's events with loved ones back in the States has never been easier.

Whenever you're away, simply dial the AT&T access number of the country you're calling from and an English-speaking AT&T Operator or voice prompt will put you through in seconds. You can bill the call to your AT&T Card, U.S. local calling card, or call collect. You'll get economical AT&T rates and keep hotel surcharges to a minimum.

It's all part of our continuing commitment to be there for you. Even when you're on the other side of the planet.

So surprise someone back home with a call. Who knows? Perhaps they'll have a little surprise for you.
